Will a merchant who is wise ever cease to advertise? Yes—when the trees grow upside down; when the beggar wears a crown; when ice forms on the sun; when the sparrows weigh a ton; when gold dollars get to cheap; when secrets women keep; when a duck forgets to swim; when Satan sings a hymn; when girls go back on gum; when the small boy hates a drum; when no politician schemes, when mince pies make pleasant dreams; when its fun to break a tooth; when all lawyers tell the truth; when cold water makes you drunk; when you love to smell a skunk, when the drummer has no brass—when these things shall come to pass; then men that's wise will neglect to advertise.

Early Closing.

Last year when we advocated the weekly half-holiday in Walkerton some merchants said the farmers would not like it and would go to other towns to do their business. Although we were never of the opinion that the farmers were quite so narrow-minded or inconsiderate of the clerk we did not discuss the question with them. The following letter from an exchange, gives, we think, the view of every fair-minded farmer in regard to this question.

To the Editor

Dear Sir,—I read with pleasure the article in your last issue regarding the weekly half holiday. You state that some Villagers claim to be opposed to it because the farmers are. I do not know any farmers of repute that would not resent that form of excuse. The farmers are not a lot of hogs. They feel that the merchants are giving them fully better service than should be expected. What right have we to expect the merchants and their staff to be at their place of business on Wednesday night until nearly midnight and then again on Saturday evening until the same hour? Why! the merchants are spoiling us. In our busy season it is a great accommodation to have an open night or two each week, but it is asking altogether too much to expect the merchants to do that the year round. The merchants can enjoy home life as well as we. Surely then in return for this liberality of service we should not only favour but practically demand that the merchants take a half holiday each week, they will then be giving us six days service each week. In addition to the half holiday I would go farther and suggest close stores at least 8:30 p. m. on Wednesday and Saturday nights.

Prosecute Sunday Paper.

Deputy Chief Whatley of Hamilton has written to the Attorney-General's Department, Toronto, asking permission to prosecute the owners and managing editor of a Toronto Sunday paper for a breach of the Lord Day's Act. An extra was printed and circulated last Sunday, the papers sent to Hamilton being confiscated by the police

Paisley Boy Wounded.

Pte. Jas. A. McLeod, mentioned last week as one of the wounded in France, was the youngest member of the Princess Pats, and was endearingly called "The Baby." He is 22 years of age and was born in Paisley, but three years ago went to Calgary, where he enlisted last August. He took a special course in aeroplane gun instruction at Salisbury, and while engaged in this work the aeroplane on one occasion turned turtle, and dashing to the ground, instantly killed it's other occupant. McLeod, however, marvellously escaped unhurt. He afterwards became a motorcycle despatch rider and was responsible for some record performances. He is the only son of Mrs. A. B. McLeod, who now lives at Elbo, Sask.—Paisley Advocate.

The Horse and the Road.

A bill has been favorably reported in the Massachusetts Legislature which authorizes the Highway Commission to investigate and report upon the feasibility of so constructing state roads that a space may be reserved on either side of them for horse-drawn vehicles. The effort to make a road adapted to the automobile has resulted in a road surface upon which it is almost impossible for a horse to get a footing. At present both in the city and in the country, horses are constantly falling on highways that are like polished iron. This agitation is bound to increase until some solution of the difficulty is found. The number of draught horses in Massachusetts on farms and in cities does not decrease in spite of the automobile and the auto-truck, and nothing is more unreasonable than that the interests of the horses and their owners should be so totally disregarded for the sake of the automobile.

What Canada is Expected to Do.

It has been officially announced from military headquarters at Ottawa that as a result of the last developments at the front, developments in which the Canadians played so striking a part, the plans of the Canadian military authorities are to send the second contingent to the front as a division and to draw on the third contingent for the very heavy reinforcements which are required in this war. This does not, however preclude the sending of the third complete division to the front, but it is acknowledged that if this is done it will mean participation by Canada in the present conflict to a far greater extent than at present. To keep two divisions in the field up to strength it will, it is calculated, on the basis of the Ypres engagement and other recent fighting, require at least 8000 new men per month, or 96000 per year. If the plan to keep 50000 men in Canada under arms is adhered to it will mean by the end of the year that the Dominion will have sent 115,000 soldiers to the front and will have 50,000 at home. It is understood that according to present intentions, reinforcements are to be drawn from the third contingent for the first unit at the rate of one company at a time from each battalion. After the second contingent has left Canada there will be no fewer than 100 Canadian nurses at the front or in England. There are already 250 additional doctors overseas and a request has been received for 100 more to serve in the British forces. No base hospital will be sent with the second contingent. There are still 1200 applications from Canadian nurses for military positions and no difficulty is being encountered in getting the best material.

Canadian Glory.

One result of the Canadian achievement in Flanders will be that hereafter Canadian soldiers will rank among the best in the world. Their fellow-countrymen had already formed this estimate of them. Our climate, our pioneer conditions, our national and imperial spirit have combined to breed a race of men, perhaps unequalled in virility, in sturdiness, and in the raw material of martial prowess. All they ever needed was adequate training. It comes as a surprise even to Canadians that after only a few weeks at Valcartier and a few months at Salisbury Plains, they should have proven superior to the flower of the Prussian Legions, who have spent years in arms. What could they not have done had they had like advantage!—Hamilton Spectator.

Buy at Home'

The man who runs a store account several months buying in small quantities should never go away from the store that accommodated him, in case he should have $20 or $30 to spend, and then come home with his purchases and say he can do better at some other place than at home. It is always to be presumed that a man who making large cash purchases can drive a closer bargain than one who makes small purchases on time. We believe there is no town in the country where goods are sold on a smaller margin than in the stores of this vicinity. If you have $20 ready cash give your home merchant a chance to show you what value in goods he can give you. A dollar's worth of sugar on six or twelve months credit is a very different deal from a $20 spot cash transaction for a few articles of haberdashery.

Prospects Good in West.

Sir, William MacKenzie, head of the Canadian Northern, who returned on Friday last from a trip over the Western lines, brings glowing reports of the crop situation and weather conditions in Western Canada. "Conditions out there couldn't be better" said Sir William. "The Spring has been an ideal one. The wheat is well up and the fields are green as far as the eye can see. The crop is easily two weeks ahead of last year, and even if we get dry weather, as we had last July, wheat will have received such a splendid start that it will be able to withstand it. It has such a good start under such desirable conditions that there is no keeping it back. From all present indications there should be a record-breaking crop throughout the West." Sir William states that optimism is the keynote in all the agricultural communities.

Second University Company.

The Canadian Militia Department has authorized the organization of a Second University Company for Overseas Service, to go as a reinforcement to the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. The Company will be commanded by Captain Geo C. McDonald, of the McGill Contingent, C.O.T.C., with Captain Percival Molson, also of the McGill Contingent, C.O.T.C., as Second in Command. Owing to the success which has attended the recruiting for the First University Company, which is at present up to full strength, and attached as "D" Company to the 38th Battalion Canadian Expeditionary Force, it was thought advisable to form another Company, and an application was made to the Department for the necessary authority, which has been granted. Recruiting for the Company has already been started, and many names have been received. The Company will be composed of Graduates of Universities or their friends. Conditions of Service and Rate of Pay will be the same as in the other Units of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The First University Company and the Toronto University and and McGill University Contingents, C.O.T.C., are going to a Training Camp at Niagara-on-the-Lake on May 3rd to the 15th, and it is expected that during the period a large number of Recruits for the new Company will be obtained. Immediately after the Camp active recruiting will be commenced at Montreal. The Headquarters of the Company will be at 392 Sherbrooke Street West, and any enquiries or applications should be addressed there to Lieutenant Geo. S. Currie, Recruiting Officer.

Ashery Changes Hands.

Wellington Richards, who has conducted the ashery business in town for the past fifteen or twenty years, has sold out to John Weber, teamster for Schwalm & Son, who gets possession next Monday. The deal includes the four ash lots in the west end, the horses and vehicles. Mr Richards intends moving to the West this summer. He will be greatly missed from the Carrick highways.—Mildmay Gazette.

Farmers Stationery.

Every up to date 20th century farmer should have his name and address neatly printed on his envelopes and writing paper, also the name of his farm, especially since the rural delivery has been established. It not only looks business like, but prevents correspondence going astray. In the event of the non-delivery of a letter from whatever cause, it will be certain to return to the sender if his name appears on the upper left-hand corner of the envelope. The Telescope can furnish farmers with printed envelopes or writing paper at small cost.

Banquet Their Chief.

Registrar G. W. Spence, of the local land titles office was tendered a banquet by the male members of the staff, on the occasion of the anniversary of his birthday at the Empress hotel on Saturday evening. Covers were laid for 30, and included some of the staff of the Swift Current land titles office. During the course of the evening the guest was presented with an illuminated address, which was in the form of a unique certificate of title. All the toasts were appropriate for the occasion, including one to "Our Boys in the Army and Navy" in honor of the nine boys of the staff now serving with the colors. After a program of songs and recitations the party dispersed about midnight having spent an enjoyable evening.—Moose Jaw News.

SHIPPING MEN IN CLOVER.

London Cable.—(Correspondence of the Associated Press)—Several large English ship-owners are piling up profits at the rate of $500,000 or over a month, and one firm at least is reported to have averaged practically a million dollars a month since the beginning of the war.

It is, of course, only those who have had their ships free who have been able to make money. Some owners had their vessels tied up by charters at normal figures and others had their ships taken by the Government. Then all the shipowners have had to bear increased expenditures for wages, fuel, or insurance and delays in port.

The people who really are making the money, according to a London shipping journal, are the Greek shipowners. "For the last few years," it explains, "the Greeks have been steadily buying ships, and they now have a very considerable merchant marine. They can take full advantage of the high rates, and do not have to face the risks British shippers do, nor pay the extra wages."

GOT THE VICTORIA CROSS.

London Cable.—The King has granted the Victoria Cross to Commander Henry Peel Ritchie, Royal Navy, for the following "conspicuous act of bravery."

"On November 28, when in command of the searching and demolition operations at Dar-es-Salaam, East Africa, though severely wounded several times, his fortitude and resolution enabled him to continue to do his duty, inspiring all by his example, until at his eighth wound he became unconscious. The interval between his first and last severe wound was twenty-five minutes."

CLERKS' PROTEST.

London Cable.—The appointment by the Home Secretary of a committee to work up recruiting among the shop salesmen has caused the secretary of the salesmen's union to protest against what he terms an unwarranted insinuation. To show that the salesmen have not been backward in answering the call to arms, he mentions a dry goods firm with 42 per cent. of its 200 men in the arms and a grocery with 30 per cent. of 380 men serving. Most of those remaining, he says, have shown good reason for it.

DEATH OF TWO BISHOPS.

The Game.

You play the game with your fellowmen
With honor and circumspect care;
You sit in at cards with a hand again,
And an utterly honest air:
You're, oh, so careful to play your game
With the world so honest and straight—
But how do you play your game with her
Who is sharing your love and your fate?

How do you play your game with her?
Are you honest and true and right?
Are you careful and kindly and tender and square,
And pleasant and sweet and bright?
Do you keep your score when you play at life
With the woman you think you love
As a man should do with his trusting wife
While the angels keep tally above?

It isn't the game you play with the world,
But the game that you play with her,
That counts when the records at last are furled
And you rake the chips in a whir.
Have you played her fair, have you played her true,
Have you dealt the cards foursquare;
Have you known what she was and meant to you,
Have you always treated her fair?

Not Complimentary.

Mrs. Black—I don't want to make a scene, but that man over there is staring at me very offensively, Mr. Black.

He is, eh? I'll speak to him. Mrs. Black a few moments later—Did he apologize? Mr. Black—Y-e-s; he said he was looking for his aunt and thought at first that you were she!

BETTY BROWN SAYS;

IT SUGGESTS GAYETY RATHER THAN GRIEF.
BLACK AND WHITE GARB BY NO MEANS SOMBRE.

Monte Carlo, the only place on the face of all Europe where Gaity and Fashion reign and take no heed of war has set the fashion for black and white.

Black and white may be "second mourning," but nevertheless it's very striking—more vivid than the gaudiest of colors and lends itself to effective combinations far from sombre.

One of the few fashions American women have borrowed from Europe this spring is the black and white [illegible] stripes are very popular, but the combination is often effected by wearing a jaunty jacket of black [illegible] of black and white.

The Mystery of the Pelican

On the 3rd of October, 1914, the ship Julia Gowan sailed from New York for Genoa, Italy. She was an English bottom, owned by Americans, and converted after the great European war broke out to a United States vessel. She carried a cargo of copper. Whether it was intended for Italy or was to be forwarded to a country engaged in war I never knew, but I did know that copper was in great demand for the manufacture of ammunition, and I further knew that, although we were sailing under the stars and stripes, our captain was constantly on the lookout for war vessels, though I am not sure whether at that time copper had been declared a contraband of war.

We steered a course south of that usually taken by ships bound for the Mediterranean in order to take as little risk as possible. There are few vessels to be met with in that part of the world's waters, and we did not speak a ship till we were in longitude 32 degrees 18 minutes west, latitude 28 degrees 20 minutes north, and then we spoke a vessel we came upon because she had been abandoned.

I went aboard to have a look at her cargo and found the hold full of rifles. The machinery seemed to be in good working order and there was a trace of fire left in the furnace. The only thing wanting was the lifeboats. I saw no reason why she should not be taken into port as a prize. I signaled the captain, telling him what I had found, and he came aboard to have a look at the ship and cargo himself.

We concluded that the vessel had sighted a man-of-war and that the crew, expecting capture, had concluded to get away themselves. There were several ways by which they might have escaped—in a fog or by boarding a faster vessel than the pursuer. The absence of the ship's boats tended to confirm this theory.

The captain concluded to try to get the vessel into port as a prize. If she could be taken to Europe her cargo would be very valuable, but of course there was danger of capture by war vessels, for there was no doubt that a cargo of rifles was contraband of war. Anyway the captain directed me to remain on board with the men I had with me, including an engineer that he would send me, and ordered me to try to get the ship to some Spanish or a Portuguese port. If I could get far enough north to reach the western coast of France, better still, but he advised me not to try for France unless I was chased and saw a chance to escape in that direction.

One unexpected discovery was made—there had been a woman aboard. We found in a stateroom we supposed to have been intended for the captain a lot of feminine paraphernalia. Thinking that in this room I might find something that would throw light on the case I made a careful search. I found nothing except a crumpled bit of writing paper, on which had been written in a woman's hand:

"Father, why am I locked in my room? I am frightfully worried about you. Something must have happened. I will try to get this to you, but I don't know how."

There was just enough in this to be tantalizing. Who was "father"? And who was Helen? She had evidently not been able to send her message and had crumpled it and thrown it into one of the drawers.

It was about 3 o'clock in the afternoon when we discovered the cruiser, and by the time it fell dark she had approached within five or six miles of us. I ordered every light put out, but she brought a searchlight to bear on us, and immediately after fired a gun after us. Then a friendly fog came along and threw a mantle about us that not even a searchlight could penetrate. The cruiser lost us and didn't find us again.

The next day one of the crew came to me and reported that the men were in great fear that the ship was haunted. Moans had been heard. I sent for the man who had heard them and ordered him to take me to the part of the ship from where they seemed to have emanated. He led me to a lower deck, where there were a few staterooms. I opened several of them, but found nothing. Then suddenly a sound of some one crying came from one of the others. I passed two doors before I located the sound. Then, trying a third, I found it locked.

I knocked, but my doing so only seemed to increase the sobbing within.

"We are friends," I said, "and wish to serve you."

"Then why have you locked me in here, and left me without food or drink?"

The voice was that of a woman. I told her that if she would open the door I would explain certain matters to her of which she might be ignorant. She replied that she could not open the door, for she had not the key. Whereupon I decided that if she could not open it I would.

"Look out!" I cried. "I'm going to break down the door." Then, backing back, I put my foot against it, and it flew open.

Inside was a girl about 18 years old. She was dressed, but had got into a berth to avoid the opening [illegible]. Crouching back, she was evidently uncertain whether we were friends or enemies to do her harm. She was very pale and weak, and I saw at once that she was starving. Before questioning her I sent for food, of which I gave her sparingly. Then I carried her up to the stateroom, where I had found women's clothing.

She told me that this had been her room, and she had been taken from it by several members of the crew to the one in which I had found her.

As soon as the girl was able to talk, fully expecting that the mystery of the Pelican was about to be solved, I asked for her story. I was doomed to disappointment. She knew very little more than I did. Her father was or had been master of the Pelican. He had sailed from a small port in the States. He had told his daughter before sailing that she might go on a trip with him, but nothing more. One morning when she had tried to leave her stateroom she found the door locked. The same evening she had been taken to the room in which I found her and was confined there. A supper had been given her and the next morning a breakfast. That was all she knew. She was much surprised to learn that the ship had been deserted and greatly feared for her father's safety, for she was sure that, if free to act, he would not have left her to perish.

I cross questioned Miss Bradford—Helen Bradford was her name—hoping to get some clew that would enable me at least to form a theory which would solve the mystery. I got nothing. She did not even know that the cargo consisted of rifles. She was aware that a great war was being fought, and her father had told her that the ship was liable to be overhauled by a cruiser and searched, but whatever happened she would be in no danger. The only incident she mentioned bearing on the case was that the porthole in her stateroom had been darkened at night.

Our voyage proved an exciting one, chased as we were on several occasions by cruisers. We always showed a neutral flag and at the same time a clean pair of heels. The worst of it was that we were driven off our course several times, and kept wandering about in the Atlantic Ocean. On one occasion being chased by a gunboat, we would have been taken were it not for the fact that we could do about a knot more than she.

During a spell of bad weather we lost our reckoning, and one still morning, enveloped in a fog, we went ashore on the coast of Morocco. We had various visitors, among them an Italian trader, to whom I confided the secret of my cargo. He proved wealthy enough to buy it and paid me in gold. I went ashore with Miss Bradford and the crew, and the next night a storm made kindling wood of the Pelican. I married Miss Bradford, and we returned to America. I constituted myself a court of admiralty and divided the price for the Pelican's cargo as I considered just, my wife getting the principal part. We have not as yet heard from her father, and the mystery of the Pelican is still unsolved. My theory is that the crew mutinied; that, being chased by a cruiser, they left the ship in the ship's boats, taking the captain a prisoner with them. His daughter may have been left in the hurry of departure.—Boston Post.

FASHION LIKES STRIPES
MISS BETTY BROWN
WEARS 'EM UP AND DOWN

Fashion has garbed itself in stripes for the early summer season.

Sometimes these stripes are blue and black, sometimes red and brown, but more frequently they are black and white.

This model, designed by Mme. Alla Ripley of the Fashion Art League of America, shows how effectively the stripes may be used if the vertical lines of the skirt are reversed in the frills. A coat to match the dominant color of the gown adds to the attractiveness of the costume in stripes.

As The Result
Of a Neglected Cold He Contracted
SEVERE BRONCHIAL TROUBLE.

Mr. W. T. Allen, Halifax, N.S., writes: "I feel that I would be doing you and your great remedy, Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, a gross injustice if I did not write and let you know the wonderful results that I have obtained from its use.

"Last spring I happened to contract a cold. Of course, this is a common occurrence, and I did not take any particular notice of it at the time. However, it did not break up as quickly as colds generally did with me, so after two weeks, and no sign of improvement, I began to get alarmed, and went to my local physician who informed me that I had contracted severe bronchial trouble as a result of neglecting my cold. He prescribed some medicine for me, which I took for about two weeks without any sign of improvement. I was getting pretty much discouraged by then, but one day a friend happened to be in to whom I was relating my trouble, and he advised me to try Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup, saying that he had obtained very beneficial results from its use in a similar case. I took his advice and procured several bottles from my druggist. After taking it, according to directions, for about two days, I noticed a decided improvement, and from that day on I began to get better, and in ten days I was in my usual health. I consider this an excellent showing for your remedy, and can highly recommend it to anyone afflicted as I was. I shall always put in a good word for it whenever the opportunity offers itself."

You can procure Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup from any druggist or dealer. Price, 25c and 50c. The genuine is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

The Sleepy Song.

As soon as the fire burns red and low
And the house upstairs is still,
She sings me a queer little sleepy song
Of sheep that go over the hill.

The good little sheep run quick and soft,
Their colors are gray and white;
They follow their leader nose to tail,
For they must be home by night.

And one slips over, and one comes next,
And one runs after behind,
The gray one's nose at the white one's tail,
The top of the hill they find.

And when they get to the top of the hill
They quietly slip away,
But one runs over and one comes next—
Their colors are white and gray.

And over they go, and over they go,
And over the top of the hill,
The good little sheep run quick and soft,
And the house upstairs is still.

And one slips over, and one comes next,
The good little, gray little sheep!
I watch how the fire burns red and low,
And she says that I fall asleep.

The Cause of Dyspepsia.
The Symptoms and The Cure.

THE CAUSE.

Too rapid eating, eating too much, and too often, improperly chewing the food, eating too much stimulating food, and indulging in improper diet generally.

THE SYMPTOMS.

Variable appetite, rising and souring of food, heartburn, wind in the stomach, a feeling of weight in the stomach, in fact a feeling that your stomach has gone all wrong and that the food you eat does not seem to agree with you.

THE CURE.

BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS.

Mrs. E. Williamson, Whitby, Ont., writes: "I have been a sufferer for years from dyspepsia, and could scarcely eat anything. I tried Burdock Blood Bitters, and I am entirely cured. I have not been troubled since I took it, and that is two years ago. I can now eat anything I wish."

Cousin Lisa
(By Donald Chamberlin)

When I tell you that my name is Shovaloff you immediately picture a man with a heavy beard, stocky hair, large and thick set form. In other words you fancy me to be a Russian. If you were to see me you would behold a rather small man with closely cut hair and clean shaven face. Moreover I cannot speak a word of Russian. I can only speak English and American English at that, for I was born in the United States and till recently had never been off the North American continent.

My father was born in the province of Perm in Eastern Russia, living near its borders. He came to America when he was very young, married an American girl and died within a year after I was born.

My father brought a little money with him from Russia, which he used to a profit and left my mother in comfortable circumstances. When I was 25 a letter came to her stating that the farm which had been in the Shovaloff family for many years must be sold, and I was interested. She proposed that I go to Russia and look after the matter. I loved travel and caught at the plan eagerly.

When I reached my father's former home I did not wonder that he had left it. The country round about was thinly settled, though a village had grown up near the farm. The people had their own customs, which had been handed down to them through many generations. Some of these customs were very quaint.

My father had left a brother and a sister in Russia. The brother had died unmarried, but the sister, a widow, still lived. She had but one child, a daughter who jointly with me would inherit the farm. She was a very shy, though a very pretty, little damsel about 17 years old. I could not talk with my aunt or my cousin because they spoke no English and I no Russian, but we found an interpreter who served our purpose fairly well.

There was no hotel in the place, and I was obliged to set up a dwelling of my own. This I did in a small house which had been vacated. A middle aged woman who spoke a little English consented to be my housekeeper and do my cooking. My aunt did not invite me to stay at her house. Why, I knew not.

The business that brought me to Russia was very slow in working itself out, and the prospect of my getting away was not promising. I had been in the village several weeks when one morning I was surprised by a visit from my Cousin Lisa. She came in, all blushes and with a [illegible] manner. My housekeeper being present, I saw no impropriety in her coming, but I nevertheless wondered at it. Not being able to communicate with her more than to say good morning, I asked the housekeeper to inquire if there was anything I could do for my cousin. A few words passed between the two, and the housekeeper, with some embarrassment I thought, said that there was only one thing I could do for my cousin, but I had better find it out for myself.

I concluded that I had struck another of the strange customs of the country and that I might as well let it work itself out. Lisa assisted the housekeeper in the work and I went out about the business concerning which I had come to Russia. I did not return till evening, expecting surely that my cousin had gone. What was my surprise to find her still there.

"How long," I asked my housekeeper, "is Lisa going to stay here?"

"Always, unless you turn her out."

"Turn her out!"

"Yes. And you cannot do that unless you are willing to suffer the resentment of every one hereabout."

"What does all this mean?"

"It means that Lisa has offered to marry you."

I was thunder struck. Little by little I drew from my informer that in this region of Russia when a woman wishes to marry a man she goes to his house and remains there, awaiting his action. If he refuses her it is considered a great insult to her and her family. If he had male relatives they were likely to avenge what was considered a slight to her and them.

While I had been charmed by my little cousin I had had up to this moment no thought of marrying her. Her action put the idea into my head. A marriage between us would greatly facilitate the settling of the inheritance in which we were interested. She was very lovely, very modest, and in her quaint Russian costume as an American lady I would have no reason, at home, to be ashamed of her.

I accepted Lisa's proposal and as soon as I had done so sent her home to prepare for the wedding. My aunt told me that she had seen from the first that her daughter had given me her heart, and she had encouraged her to act as she had done.

When I took home with me a bride, my mother was surprised, but when I told her how the betrothal had come about she was astonished. Fortunately my wife's modest demeanor did not permit my mother to associate any boldness with her act.

We have but recently returned to America and, although Lisa is studying English with great assiduity, we are not yet able to converse with much ease.—New York Press.

"WHY" OF A "HOT BOX."

A Railroad Official Says the Cause is Simply Carelessness.

In answer to the question "What is a hot box," a Kansas City Southern official has the following to say:

"A hot box is a sign that the safety first rule is not practised by some car department men.

"There is no excuse for a hot box after a car is sent out if the train is carefully looked over by the car men at each terminal. Primarily a hot box is caused by poor waste and an insufficient 'greasing' at the time it should have been done, and there is no excuse for one. A hot box is liable to cause a wreck, and a wreck on most railroads costs money, much more than the price of a sufficient quantity of waste and oil and grease to protect the journals of the car wheels.

"The farmer who buys a new wagon or a buggy has a pretty good idea of what a hot box means and the ways to prevent it. When he buys a new wagon he sees to it that the spindle is well greased so it will not get hot. He watches it closely and does not take any chances on the wheels running hot. The farmer's wheels on his new wagon or buggy would stick and if he persisted in driving ahead he would soon have a bad spindle and a bad wheel.

"However, the results would not be as disastrous as they would be in a train of cars running at a speed of fifteen or twenty miles an hour. It's no wonder that trainmen use language unfit for a Sunday school class when they find a hot box in their train. They know that some one has been careless or shirking in his work and that someone is to blame."—New York Post.

The Social Code.

We are kept orderly, clean and decent through the strength of an obedience to social opinion which the reports of individuals are in such haste to deplore. The social code, no doubt, always includes much tameness, much timidity, some hypocrisy and even some wickedness; but taken by and large, the average of its prescriptions has probably been higher in excellence than the average of undirected and untutored individual impulse. Many of the things embodied in that wide ranging, multifarious thing called the sense of the community are undoubtedly right, since they were once the distinctions of heroic minorities or of courageous or fearless individuals.

FARM AND GARDEN

SWEET CORN.

The season is drawing near for corn. Sweet corn for early market is planted 10 to 15 days earlier than field corn. Four grains in a hill for late plantings, and six for the early sowing when weather and soil conditions are less favorable, should give an average of three stalks to a hill.

Hills four and one-half feet apart in either direction give room for good development of stalk and ear, with larger varieties. Dwarf varieties may be planted three by three feet part. The very early varieties tend to dwarf stalks, and the later varieties to a more uniform development of stalk and ear, so one wishing to realize some fodder material, as well as ears for the market, should grow the longer-standing varieties, such as Evergreen, Stowell's Evergreen, Late Mammoth, etc.

In a good season the sweet corn crop is a valuable asset to the progressive farmer. To quite an extent it is a catchy crop.

Among the dwarf early varieties are Early Cory, White Cory and Perry Hybrid; Long Island Beauty, Early Mammoth and Early Evergreen mature a little earlier than the Stowell's Evergreen, Mammoth and other late varieties, hence are useful as second-early or medium varieties.

Before deciding on what variety to plant it is well to study the proposed market. Some excellent varieties are not popular because not well known. For instance, in some markets the Country Gentleman does not sell well because people do not realize that it is small cobbed with deep grain, but merely judge the ear by its apparent size.

It is not well to choose very dry land for sweet corn, as a dry spell may ruin your crop entirely. Sweet corn likes a rich, sandy loam if given some potash. A little potash in each hill tends to produce a good set of fine, large ears.

Nitrate of soda, a small handful to four hills if applied as the cornstalk begins to tassel, seems to have a strong influence upon the success of the crop.

Poultry manure—a handful to each hill, beneath the corn—is a great fertilizer for this crop, as is any animal product. Fish-scrap, tankage, etc., contribute to a healthy, vigorous growth of stalk and a good yield of corn.

Apply it in the hill, slightly cover it with earth and plant the corn upon it. The farmers in this locality often use barnyard compost in this way.

Aside from the question of fertilizer, the growth of sweet corn depends largely upon tile. Many a crop of sweet corn is saved in dry weather by persistent cultivation before earing.

After it is in tassel, all work with the cultivator must cease. For cultivating the early varieties use a straight or harrow-toothed cultivator set very shallow, and running it through often enough to keep the ground clean.

The first pulling should take place when an inspection of the field shows a number of ears with silk dried almost to the tip of the ear, the ear sagging somewhat from the stalk. This first pulling hurries the growth of the other ears.

Pull the corn for market at the size desired for the table. There is a great deal of sweet corn pulled by green hands that is either immature or overgrown. This is waste to both the producer and the consumer.

After the crop of sweet corn is gathered the stalks should be cut and stacked immediately, that the rich elements be not given to the air, nor reached back by the roots, but conserved within the stalk and foliage.

Sweet corn is grown and cultivated the same as field corn, except it requires more intensive culture as a horticultural crop. It needs a rich, warm loamy soil that has been well prepared by thorough cultivation and heavy fertilizing with well-rotted barnyard manure.

In early planting, plenty of seed should be used, for if the weather is backward, much of it is likely to rot. Some quick-acting nitrogenous fertilizer should be used for the early crop, to furnish immediate available plant food. In a test made some years ago at the New Jersey station, the average yield of sweet corn was increased 21 per cent. by the use of nitrate of soda, 25 per cent. when sulphate of ammonia was used, and 35 per cent. when dried blood was used. Other features of the test showed that it is advisable to use an abundance of all forms of fertilizers for sweet corn.

The early crop should be put in at the earliest moment after danger from frost is past. Other plantings may be made at intervals of a week to 10 days thereafter, to afford a succession until late fall.

About six kernels, which will furnish 3 to 5 stalks, should be put in each hill. It requires about eight quarts of seed to plant an acre. Shallow cultivation should be practiced to preserve the moisture of the soil, since this crop requires a large amount of water in its growth, and is likely to suffer from drought.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

The best way to start a dairy herd is to select good-grade cows, young and from milk producers. These may be bought at reasonable prices, but care must be exercised to select good individuals. Then by breeding these to pure-bred bulls from the best milk strains obtainable profitable dairy animals may be raised. Under no circumstances should the cow be bred to any but the best sire. If one has no bull of the kind it would be better to secure the service of one, even though a high price is charged and some difficulty encountered in finding the animal. Later a few good pure-bred heifers may be bought, and a desirable bull, then some thoroughbred animals can be raised to take the place of the grades when they have served their purpose.

The value of ashes as a fertilizer depends upon the character of the soil and the kind of crop to be grown. Generally speaking, ashes, or potash, is very important for most crops, but in some soils there is enough of the element already, and for some crops, as wheat, oats and corn, but little is required. Wheat removes but seven pounds of potash per acre, oats 10 and corn 15 pounds, while potatoes remove 75 pounds, showing that they require a larger amount of this element. Timothy hay takes 15 pounds per ton and clover 35 pounds.

It has been well said that a farm can never rise above the level of its owner.

Shade must be provided for the fowls and the little chicks during hot weather.

Breeding for size will be of little advantage unless you feed for size at the same time.

A heavy draft horse should never be driven faster than a walk with or without a load.

Rhubarb requires a deep, rich, mellow soil. In fact, the soil for it cannot be too rich. The earliest yield is from a warm, sandy loam. The longest stalks and the greatest number may be grown on a deep, rich clay loam. The ground should be plowed twice and harrowed and rolled to get it in good order.

A sandy loam is the best soil for muskmelons. Scattered over it barnyard manure, plow and harrow to pulverize it thoroughly. When the weather is quite warm and trees are fully leaved out, the hills may be prepared for seed. When the melons begin to ripen a bunch of straw placed under them will prevent the fruit from cracking.

Hubbard squash should be more generally grown and used. When properly cooked and seasoned it is a delicious vegetable and is available for use from October until June. The hills should be eight by eight feet apart and enriched with rotted manure unless the land is quite fertile. They may also be grown in rows eight feet apart, drilling the seed and thinning the plants to about two feet.

She Soon Gained Forty Pounds

Dame Bouchard Found New Health in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Now She is Advising all Her Friends Who Suffer From Kidney Disease to Use Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Portneuf, Hamilton Cove, Saguenay Co., Que., May 10.—(Special.)—Perfectly cured by the use of Dodd's Kidney Pills, Dame Rose Bouchard, well known and highly respected here, is advising all her friends who suffer from Kidney disease to use Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"When I commenced to take Dodd's Kidney Pills I was so run-down I only weighed eighty pounds," Dame Bouchard states. "I only took four boxes in all, but they brought me back to health and now I weigh one hundred and twenty pounds. You may publish what I say, if you wish, for Dodd's Kidney Pills have done wonders for me."

Dodd's Kidney Pills do wonders for run-down people because they cure the Kidneys. Cured Kidneys strain all the impurities, all the poisons, out of the blood and the pure blood carries new nourishment, health and life to all parts of the body. That's why so many people say, "Dodd's Kidney Pills gave me a new lease of life."

AN OLD NORMAN CUSTOM.

The "Cry for Justice" Still Survives in the Channel Islands.

An interesting and unusual revival of an ancient Norman custom occurred at Guernsey not long ago when Daniel Sebire, jurat, justicier elect of Alderney, whose election the royal court annulled because he had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment some years ago, raised a clameur de haro, or a "cry for justice," against a fresh election by kneeling bareheaded at the entrance of the courthouse and exclaiming, "Haro! Haro! Haro, a l'aide, mon prince, on me fait tort!" (Help me, my prince! They do me wrong).

The clameur de haro, an ancient Norman custom, still survives in the Channel Islands. The appellant must, on his knees and before witnesses, raise the cry that acts as an injunction until the alleged tort or trespass has been passed on by the court. If the trespasser continues he is liable to arrest and punishment. Although the clameur is still legal in the Channel Islands, recourse to it is very rare, and there has been no instance of it in Alderney for two centuries. It is, however, a very effective procedure.

The derivation usually ascribed to the form of the plea is curious. "Haro" is said to be an abbreviation of "Ha, Rollo!" a direct appeal to Rollo, the first Duke of Normandy, and the cry is thus traced back to the days when there were no courts and justice was personally meted out by princes. It is, however, more probable that "haro" is simply an exclamation to attract attention.

A similar custom, applicable only in criminal cases, was the Saxon clamor violentiae, which existed at the time of the Norman invasion.—Youth's Companion.

When cleaning a corset, it should be allowed to stand in cold water two hours before laundering.

An olive oil bath is very fine for a palm or fern. Put two tablespoonfuls at the roots of your palm or fern and you have no idea—unless you have tried it—what the improvement will be.

A bill file with its point protected with a cork is a useful little object to hold a spool of carpet warp for crocheting.

To make ferns, geraniums and nearly all house plants grow, put a teaspoonful of ammonia in one quart of water (lukewarm) and water the plants with it. This should not be used more than twice a week.

If the teapot becomes musty, put a lump of sugar in it before putting it away. It will smell sweet when you want to use it.

If the seats of caned chairs are sagged down, wash well on the bottom side and when nearly dry rub the bottom over with water in which a little glue has been dissolved. Let them dry bottom side up.

To remove grease spots from delicate colored silk, take a lump of magnesia, and rub it wet on the spot. Let it dry, then brush off and the spot will be gone.

A crack in the range can often be repaired by using a filling made of wood ashes and common salt moistened with water. This will prove hard and lasting.

Cold slaw is greatly improved by the addition of a few leaves of parsley chopped fine with the cabbage, or two or three stalks of celery chopped with the cabbage. A rich mayonnaise should always be used for slaw, unless a French boiled dressing is preferred.

Masked Women.

Upper class Swahili women wear curious masks, which are made of feather and beads in a wooden frame. The mask is derived from the traditional usage of Moslem women, who must keep their faces covered in the presence of men. For several centuries Arab traders have frequented this East African coast, and to their influence are due most of the civilized customs found to-day among the natives of the district. The clothing worn by these prosperous dames is of silk; their shoes are partly of silver, and they wear much silver jewelry. The Moslems of Zanzibar, by the way, are less fanatically strict about religious usages than their brethren in Morocco and Turkey.—Wide World Magazine.

BANISH PIMPLES AND ERUPTIONS

In the Spring Most People Need a Tonic Medicine.

One of the surest signs that the blood is out of order is the pimples, unsightly eruptions and eczema that come frequently with the change from winter to spring. These prove that the long indoor life of winter has had its effect upon the blood, and that a tonic medicine is needed to put it right. Indeed, there are few people who do not need a tonic at this season. Bad blood does not merely show itself in disfiguring eruptions. To this same condition is due attacks of rheumatism and lumbago; the sharp stabbing pains of sciatica and neuralgia; poor appetite and a desire to avoid exertion. You cannot cure these troubles by the use of purgative medicines—you need a tonic, and a tonic only, and among all medicines there is none can equal Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for their tonic, life-giving, nerve-restoring powers. Every dose of this medicine makes new, rich blood which drives out impurities, stimulates every organ and brings a feeling of new health and energy to weak, tired, ailing men, women and children. If you are out of sorts give this medicine a trial and see how quickly it will restore the appetite, revive drooping spirits, and fill your veins with new, health-giving blood.

You can get these Pills from any medicine dealer or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

POLITICAL CRIME IS CRIME.

(Philadelphia Record)

The convictions at Terre Haute ought to have some educational effect upon the whole tribe of predatory politicians. It is time that the least scrupulous politician of that class should take notice that the people intend to have honest elections, and while they may occasionally be defrauded, they will not put up with it any more than they will put up with burglary and highway robbery. Political crime is crime, the men who commit it are as criminal as men who forge and swindle, and no man can practise political crime and maintain a different status from the man who commits financial crime.

THE POULTRY WORLD

MARKETING EGGS.

Housewives in buying eggs are usually very particular, and it is only right that they should be. They like uniform, clean eggs, and while others may be just as good for baking and eating purposes, it is up to the producer to furnish as near what the demand requires as it is possible for him to do so.

Quality eggs are sterile eggs, that is, eggs which have never been fertilized by the presence of the male bird in the flock. A sterile egg cannot grow and develop—a fact that is of the greatest importance to the producer of market eggs for table purposes. A sterile egg can be kept longer and in warmer temperatures than a fertile egg, and it will not spoil. A fertile egg starts to develop, and if that development is arrested the germ dies and the egg rots. Blood rings and many rots are caused in this way. These are troubles that will never occur in sterile eggs.

In the spring farmers in general want to raise some chicks, and in order to do this must have males in the flock from which eggs are saved for hatching purposes. If the whole flock is used for the production of eggs that will hatch the surplus eggs will have to be marketed, and they will be fertile eggs. The solution of this problem is going to lie in the simple use of the breeding pen. Every poultry raiser should select the best hens in his flock and separate them from the others along in early January. They can only be used to build up the flock of the coming year but will allow for the greatest number of eggs to be sold for table purposes, and they will be sterile eggs, eggs that will not rot.

After the breeding season is over all males should be either disposed of or shut up by themselves. On the average farm where the males are not high-priced birds as a rule, the best thing to do is to kill or sell the roosters. This leaves the entire flock of hens to produce sterile eggs until another year's hatching season rolls around.

The conditions which prevail within the laying house have a direct effect upon the quality of the market or table eggs. It is in the house that most of the "dirties" and spotted eggs are produced. These, if allowed to get onto the market, present a bad appearance, and do not tend to build up a demand for your eggs. Clean litter, which keeps the birds' bodies and feet clean is a simple way in which to help produce clean eggs, and also is an important step in the preservation of the health of the fowl.

The nests should be large enough to properly accommodate the hens. Small nests often result in cracked eggs, another bad quality that is often found in eggs sold from the farm. Sell a perfectly whole egg. For the smaller breeds of fowl, like the Leghorns, nest some 12 by 12 inches in size, is preferable, while for birds of the general purpose type, such as the Rhode Island Red and the Plymouth Rock, a nest some three inches larger each way is far better.

In the spring and winter laying hens kept under artificial conditions almost entirely, and being fed dry grains and mashes often tend to become constipated. This is a serious condition and has serious results. If it continues for any length of time it means a cessation of egg production, but at least it often causes eggs to be laid with bloody shells. [illegible] The feeding of mangel beets, or sprouted oats, or other form of succulent, juicy food will correct this condition in the great majority of cases.

When eggs are stored in a warm room evaporation takes place more rapidly, and in a cool room little evaporation does take place. Do not store eggs in a room in which there are vegetables and other commodities, for eggs are like milk in that they tend to absorb odors. A first-class egg must have no foreign odor or taste. Eggs should be stored in baskets, or cartons, where they will not accumulate dirt. When dusty eggs are handled dirty stains are bound to appear on the shells, and this is especially important in the case of white eggs.

The greatest care should always be taken in the selection and grading of the eggs which are supplied to any trade. If you are dealing in white eggs the most stress must be placed on the uniformity with regard to size and shape. In making up a carton dozen of eggs be sure that all the eggs in the carton are of uniform shape and size.

When dealing with brown eggs the farmer has another problem to consider as well, that of color. Fowls that lay brown eggs tend to vary considerably in the shade of brown found in those eggs. There will be light browns and reddish browns and dark browns. When these are each put carefully and ready to be placed in the cartons the light browns should be put together and the dark browns by themselves. The finished packages will be far more attractive.

NOTES.

Fertility is at its best now, and good hatches should be the result, if the breeding pen has been properly handled, or the incubator properly run. Neither is self-regulating, and the poultry-keeper giving the brooders and incubators the best care will obtain the best hatches.

There are more chicks harmed by overfeeding the first ten days than by underfeeding. Warmth and comfort are the main essentials for the first few days, with light feeding. After the chicks are two days old [illegible] will result in feeding. At this age they really commence to grow rapidly, and if properly hatched and reared are lively and need more feed.

Beginners in a majority of cases make the mistake of trying to raise more chickens than they can properly take care of. Better results can be obtained by raising a few good ones the first year, and then each year increasing. Over-crowding chicks has been an error that has been indulged in to a large extent and even some of the more experienced breeders take a chance now and then, with poor results in the end.

Poultry raisers had no complaint to make against the brand of weather handed out during March. While cold in this case, there was plenty of sunshine and the early hatched chicks, where given proper care, made a fine growth. April is apt to be a wet month and extra care will be required to see that the chicks are well housed.

NEWSPAPERS AND THE WAR.

(London Advertiser)

We believe the newspapers as a whole have been truthful, and have sought to secure the best news at large expense. Thousands upon thousands of words of war news are printed each day in all Canadian papers. This costs money—far more money than ordinary news would cost—and it is beyond any valuation to the reader from an historical standpoint. If the public does not grasp the full import of the war news, then the publisher is doing his work in vain. Fifty years from now the newspapers of to-day will be treasured as historic documents. The man who does not read his newspaper thoroughly and encourage his boy to read it, and his whole family to read it is not serving his intelligence. For we assert that despite censorships, which are more of a name than anything else, the public is getting masterpieces of reporting, and the master effort of the newspaper business for its casual perusal. About the handling of war news and the watchfulness and work consequent upon the neverending possibility of things fraught with vast interest, there is nothing casual, believe us.

Aesop in Mexican Guise.

Here is a story with a moral which is a popular favorite in Mexico:

"Juan," said the father, "I will do a fine thing. All I can leave you is the little burro and a single bit of good advice. This is 'Never attempt to have people satisfied with your conduct.'"

"Yes."

"Come and see."

Both the old man and Juan heard the burro, and began the old man.

"How stupid," the men said. "Why do they not ride the burro?" No doubt the burro will ride on them to-morrow."

Both the old man and Juan heard this. Then the old man said:

"Now, look here, my son, jump on the burro and I will drive him."

They reached another town. People who saw them exclaimed: "The old man must be crazy and the boy is a sin vergüenza."

"Did you hear that?" the old man questioned.

"Yes, father."

"Well, now I will ride the burro and you will drive him."

Another road was reached. Three men were passing by and one of them said: "Never in my life did I see such a thing: he is riding on the burro and lets the poor little boy march on foot. That is atrocious."

"Did you hear that?"

"Yes, father."

"All right, jump on the burro and we will both ride home."

They followed another trail, and on their road they met a number of people who came in the opposite direction, each one upon a burro. Upon seeing the old man and his son riding the burro they exclaimed: "These must be savages. When shall we have a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals? Look at that stupid old man and his son riding together on that poor burro!"

"Did you hear that?"

"Yes, father."

"Well, never from now on try to have people satisfied with your conduct."—New York Sun.

Inca Relics.

Before taking leave of Cuzco, Peru, we want to see the very interesting collection of Inca relics in the private museum of a Peruvian doctor who has devoted many years of his life to Inca research. Ranged round the walls were mummies which had been taken from rock tombs. All had been buried in a sitting posture, and judging by the horrible expression of agony on the parchment skin I should imagine that some of these—prisoners of war, I was told—had been entombed alive. The horror of those mummified faces and the awful contortions of the skeletons haunted me for a long time, nor shall I ever forget the sight.

One or two of the skulls bore evidence of skillful surgery, star shaped pieces of bone having been cleverly fitted in to repair damage done by the star shaped stone weapons of the period. I did not measure those I saw in the museum, but one of the aforesaid stone weapons which we brought back to England from Cuzco measured four inches from point to point across the top—a truly formidable club.—Wide World Magazine.

Your Floors Need Paint

Paint preserves the wood. Paint keeps floors sanitary and healthful. Painted floors make the rooms bright and cheery. Painted floors are easily cleaned—a damp cloth keeps them free of dust and germs. Paint your floors and thus have them always Spic and Span.

Senour's Floor Paint

"MADE IN CANADA"

is all ready to brush on—anyone can apply it evenly and smoothly. It gives a hard, durable, lustrous finish, that stays fresh and bright, and wears, and wears, and wears. And it costs less to use than other floor paint, because it covers more surface and wears longer.

Senour's Floor Paint comes in 14 beautiful colors, suitable for every floor in the house from kitchen to garret.

STEPHAN BROS.

The High School baseball team and the "Scrubbs" played another game on Saturday afternoon. The game was called off in the 6th innings on account of rain, the score standing 5-4 in favor of the "Scrubbs".

Butter Wrappers.

Farmers and dairymen are now required by law to use printed butter-wrappers. The Telescope has a stock on hand labelled "Choice Dairy Butter" for sale at the following prices, 100 for 35c; 250 for 75c; 500 for $1.50 or 1000 for $2.25. Larger or smaller quantities accordingly.

Prof. Reithdorf's Life Threatened.

That he has twice bee threatened with death by two residents of Berlin, was the statement made by the Prof., of Woodstock, at London on Sunday afternoon during his lecture on Militarism. He has received two threatening letters but he would continue to lecture, even if it cost him his life.

Breaking Broody Hens

Take a box about two or three feet square and put slats or wire netting on side and bottom, suspend from ceiling or nail on wall a foot or two from floor. Put top or one side on hinges, whenever you notice a hen getting broody put her in the box, feed and water regularly. In two or three days you will find shes broken off broodiness and is ready to lay again, three or four hens can be put in box at the same time.

108,760 Canadian in Arms

The total number of Canadians now on active service at home and abroad is 108,760. The recruiting up to date has been satisfactory, the various units in different parts of the country being well up to full strength. As reinforcements are collected from the various battalions of the third contingent and sent forward there will be room for more recruits in these, or battalions to be organized. There will be 50,000 men always in training in Canada and two divisions totalling nearly 50,000 at the front. These will be constantly kept up to strength by reinforcements from the men training here

The Government has done Well.

If, as now seems to be settled, it has been decided not to hold an election this summer, the Government is to be congratulated on the decision. No doubt it received many strong protests besides those which were published, and became convinced that the best public opinion was strongly against a political campaign at this time. The decision must have rested largely with Sir Robert Borden and he did the right and sensible thing. Both parties will now be able to devote themselves to the tremendous task which lies before the country. Let them talk, not of a truce, but of an alliance. The strenuous efforts the Germans are making ought to be a stimulus to us and to our allies in this great conflict. Let it be proclaimed that the decision of the Government means not merely the postponement of an election, but an evidence of Unity and a call for united action.

Midsummer Examinations

The Department of Education has sent out to school boards and teachers throughout the province the dates for the mid-summer examinations. The examinations for the junior High school graduation will be held during the week from June 16th to 23rd. The junior Public school examination in manual training and household science comes on June 17th, elementary science and art on the 17th and English grammar and Canadian history on the 18th. On June 21st the entrance examinations in composition and spelling and the graduation examination in algebra and composition will be held; next day arithmetic and literature examinations will be held for both while on the 23rd will be held the entrance examinations in English grammar, writing and geography and the Public school graduation examinations in bookkeeping, spelling and geography. The examinations in oral reading will be taken on any day of the week from 4 to 5 o'clock.

The Kaiser, a Murderer.

That he had knowledge that an attempt was to be made to torpedo the Lusitania, was the statement made by the commander of the ill-fated liner Lusitania here today. Testifying at the inquest into the deaths of the victims of the disaster who were brought here, the captain said that although the voyage was without incident up to the time the vessel was struck, he had received information that an attack would be made to sink him.

After hearing the evidence of Captain Turner of the Lusitania, who stated he had the boats swung out when he learned the attempt was to be made to sink his vessel, Coroner Horgan declared he was satisfied the responsibility lay not with the German Government but with the whole German people. The jury returned a verdict that this appalling crime was contrary to international law and charged the officers of the submarine, the German Emperor, and the Government of Germany under whose orders they acted, with wilful and wholesale murder.

Jack Wilson Fell.

Lance Corporal Jack Wilson of Hanover, who left last August with the Grey County boys of the first Canadian contingent, was wounded in the battle of Langemarck and is now in Netley Hospital, England. His wound is not serious and he is improving, according to a cablegram to his parents in Hanover Mr. and Mrs. George S. Wilson from another son, residing in London England.

Operetta Well Presented

The "Nautical Knot" presented by the Durham Choral Club in the town hall on Friday evening last under the auspices of the Daughters of the Empire was well attended. The operetta was well presented and was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience. The choruses were well received and the solos by Miss Zeta Black, contralto, are also worthy of special mention.

Baseball Note.

A Northern Baseball League has at last been organized with seven groups of teams, taking in the district from Owen Sound to Goderich and as far inland as Listowel and Palmerston. It was expected that there would be five teams in the local district, but Mildmay, Cargill and Hanover having dropped out, leaves only Walkerton and Teeswater to compete for the district honors. A double schedule has been agreed upon between the two teams and this will be drawn up this week.

Fined $10.00 and Costs.

On informations laid by License Inspector White, Jos Schmidt and Martin Hanson of Cargill, appeared in police court here on Saturday before Magistrates Tolton and Richardson and were fined $10.00 and costs on being found guilty of drinking liquor while on the Indian list. Schmidt and Hanson claimed they secured the bug-juice while at a bee, where beer was served, but this fact, however, did not free them from the penalty of the law and they were obliged to pay twelve bones each into court.

Boys in Trouble.

Two young boys of Dunkeld vicinity appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Wednesday afternoon charged with breaking into the farmhouse of Mr. Eckenswiler during Tuesday night and taking a small sum of money. They pleaded guilty and were fined $1 and costs each amounting to $12.20. It appears the boys, learning that there was no one at home, broke in the cellar window and after drinking several glasses of old cider proceeded upstairs, broke a large glass in a bookcase and helped themselves to some small change which they discovered there, then decamped. Chief Ferguson was informed of the episode and the boys were arrested the following morning.

Operated on.

Miss Rubena Clark, stenographer at the Canada Spool & Bobbin Co'y's office was suddenly stricken with appendicitis on Saturday morning and was taken to the Bruce County Hospital where an operation was performed. Miss Clark's many friends will be pleased to learn that the operation was successful and that she is now recovering.

H.S. Win Double Header.

The High School added two more victories to their list on Saturday afternoon by defeating the Knechtel Factory nine by 9-8 and the Rattan Factory by 9-1. Both games were fast throughout. The High School now have a fine record, having won eight out of eleven games played. The batteries on Saturday were, Knechtel Factory — T Rheinhardt and H Hergott, High School—J Rowland and J Rennie, Rattan—W Mullen, H Wettlaufer M Kane and H Hergott, High School—M Wilson and J Rennie.

Came Through the Battle.

Mr. A. J. Wesley editor of the Herald and Times received a letter this week from his brother Private Wm Wesley who is connected with the artillery of the First Canadian Contingent. Billie states that he was one of the lucky ones who came through the battle of Langemark unscathed and at the time of writing was resting with his company a distance behind the lines, being billeted in a shell-riddled building. Some days previous to writing Private Wesley saw Doctor Fraser ride by, but was unable to attract his attention.

Paid $20 and Costs.

Mr. Dave Karges proprietor of the Red Star Theatre and Herb Hauck, his operator appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Saturday and both were fined $20 and costs, on pleading guilty, the former to a charge of employing an unlicensed operator, and the latter to running a picture machine without a license. Mr. Karges paid his fine at once, while Hauck is paying his on the installment plan at the rate of $1 a week. Herb left for Toronto on Monday where he will try his exams and attempt to secure the necessary license required by the law.

Capt McNally Wounded.

Mr. W. J. McNalley received a telegram on Friday morning last from Ottawa conveying the news that his son Captain Arthur McNally had been wounded in the fighting in France. There were no details given as to the nature of the brave young captain's wound or how he received it and his many friends here are waiting anxiously for further word. In the casualty list his name appeared among the list of wounded which would indicate that his wound was not of a serious or fatal nature and this gives hope to his relatives and friends here. Mr. McNally has endeavored by cable to get further information, but up to the time of going to press no answer has been received.

Calling Out Reserves.

It is estimated that there are at least a quarter of a million men in Canada on the militia reserves, which it has now been decided to organize throughout the Dominion. The majority of these, it is computed are under the age of 45, and therefore of military value. The militia reserve as understood here includes all the men who have had militia training and who have received their discharge from the regiments including those who have attended the annual training camps which have been held in many places in Canada in past years, and therefore a good number of local men will be affected by this order. There is a very large number of qualified officers on the list, many of them, however, having already volunteered for active service.

Frost does Damage.

This part of Ontario experienced an exceptionally heavy frost on Wednesday night of last week and reports from sections from the shores of Lake Huron to the Niagara Peninsula state that a great deal of damage was done to growing vegetation. In the immediate vicinity some fields of grain were touched, but the greater part of the damage was done to the small fruits, apples, cherries, plums, etc., to which we have been informed the frost was disastrous, while all tomatoe plants which had been set out were destroyed. The frost was so severe that in many cases, plants in small covered hot-houses, ready for transplanting were blackened. The extent of the damage done will not be known until the fruit becomes further advanced.

Passed Examinations.

Miss Roberta Sillers who has been attending Queen's University and Miss Jean Todd of Toronto University have successfully passed their examinations and have secured teacher's permanent first-class certificates.

Sentenced for Vagrancy.

Nora Ernest, daughter of Mr. Alex Ernest, who has the reputation of being a somewhat loose character was sentenced on Saturday last by Magistrate Tolton to two years, less one month, in the Mercer Reformatory, Toronto, on a charge of vagrancy. Her father who was the chief witness against her, declared that he could do nothing with the girl, who is but sixteen years old, and took this course as a last resort. It is hoped that during her two years' servitude the girl will realize the error of her ways and return to her home a reformed individual.

Continuous Electric Service.

On June 1st the Walkerton Electric Lt. & Pr. Co. Ltd. started a continuous twenty four hour day service, and in future their customers may have the use of electric current at any hour day or night, Sunday included. Take full advantage of this splendid service by supplying your household with plenty of lights. Electric Stoves, toasters, irons, fans, etc. Call at the office and we will be pleased to show you any of these articles. The cost of operation is trifling compared to the satisfaction and comfort derived from a cool and inviting home, which the use of these utensils will assure.

Bowling Notes.

The majority of games in the President vs Vice-President competition have been played at the green and up to the present, with one game to be played, the Vice-President's side is eight points in the lead. The following are the results of the games:—

Vice-President		President
McBarney	14	Sieveright	11
Klein	12	Rourke	19
Pye	21	C. Stephan	11
Player	21	Taylor	13
Total	68		60

McNab for the Vice-President, plays Law in the final game. The senior skip competition will be proceeded with at once.

More Poisoning

Once more the poison specialists are at work in Walkerton. In a certain part of the West Ward—not a thousand miles from Durham St.—at least two dogs and so many cats have received doses of strychnine, which were fatal in all cases but one. It is difficult to understand how anyone could resort to such cowardly methods to rid himself of the annoyance caused by his neighbor's pets—especially since there is a proper legal method of procedure in such cases. If one is in a position to prove that his property has been damaged by any animal belonging to a neighbor, he has every right to go to the owner and demand reparation. Then if it is not forthcoming, he may sue for damages. The particular persons under suspicion in this instance, however, see fit to resort to the weapons of cowards and assassins. Incidentally, of course, they render themselves liable to conviction as criminals. A person who would set poison for a neighbor's dog would be capable of poisoning the neighbor as well—if he could do it without detection. Therefore, we rise to suggest that such menaces to the public health should be locked up on the principle of "safety first".

Cadet Corps Inspection.

The annual inspection of the Walkerton H.S. Cadet Corps took place on the Armory Grounds, Friday May 28th. The Corps was in complete parade uniform and a fairly large number of spectators were present. Promptly at 9 a.m. the inspector Captain Barker, appeared on the scene and a very thorough inspection followed until about 10.30 when the Captain announced himself satisfied. Every Cadet from the Captain down to the rank and file was given an opportunity to display his knowledge of military matters. And what is more important, every Cadet acquitted himself in a manner wholly satisfactory to the inspector. Apart from a few minor criticisms, the Captain had few faults to find and in his final address he took occasion to congratulate the Corps on its general efficiency. If the result of this inspection is considered, the efforts of the officers to turn out an efficient military body have been crowned with success. The Corps has been organized three years but this is practically its first appearance as a full company. A great obstacle to rapid advancement arises from the fact that new recruits are added each year, making it necessary to start at the very beginning again. Also, the Corps has this year been without a qualified instructor and therefore all the work of training has rested on the shoulders of the officers.

Baseball Saturday.

The Hanover Senior Y.M.C.A. baseball team will play the return game with the local H. S. team on Saturday afternoon at the exhibition grounds, commencing at 3.30. The High School boys are confident of being able to hold their own and the game will be a good one.

New Theatre Tax.

A law that came into effect June 1st compels all theatres in the Province of Ontario to pay a tax of $50.00 per year. Formerly moving pictures alone were thus licensed, but now all theatres, opera houses and town halls in every village town and city in the province will have to pay a tax of $50. This will be a hard blow to the small village opera halls and will not doubt be the cause of many of them closing their doors. The license for the Walkerton town hall has not yet been taken out, but this must be done before another show, lecture or concert can be held in that edifice.

Condemns Lutheran Ministers.

The following is a paragraph from the report of the address of Professor Reithdorf which he delivered in Wiarton on Sunday of last week, clipped from the columns of the Wiarton Record.

Wherever the professor had gone he said he had been received by all classes of Germans in a most kindly way. The German Evangelicals, the German Catholics the German Baptists all have received him with open arms, but the German Lutheran ministers he denounced as a class as disloyal and the fomentors of treason in our midst. Quite a number of these Lutherans are loyal but as a class they are against Britain and things British and do what they can to foster this idea in the minds of their people. One minister, however, the Rev. Spalding, of Berlin, minister of the largest Lutheran Church in Canada, who, at the beginning of the war was inclined to sympathize with the Germans, and be pro-German, after the sinking of the Lusitania came out with a strong speech in favor of the allies. Professor Reithdorf puts his condemnation of the conduct of Lutheran ministers in strong words, yet, he apparently knows what he is talking about and from what has been said of the dealings of Lutheran ministers in this vicinity, we are inclined to believe his allegations are all too true. Such being the case, the clerical robes should not excuse these men from the penalty of the law with respect to alien enemies. We invite the Lutheran ministers in this locality to state their views on the present conflict in the columns of the Telescope and in this way, unpleasant rumors and fears of true-hearted Canadians, will perhaps be dispelled.

Death of Robert McPhail.

The messenger that never tires and never pities, knocked upon the door of Robert McPhail, a retired farmer, and one of our earliest settlers, on Sunday morning. His demise was not unexpected, as cancer, that dreaded and loathsome disease had for two years been slowly, but surely sapping away his life and only his remarkable vitality preventing him from entering that better world, where pain and disease are unknown, at an earlier date. Mr. McPhail was born in New Brunswick over 79 years ago. On July 12th, 1853 he first saw Walkerton from the top of what is now known as Shaw's hill. The sight that greeted his eyes was one which he never forgot. Instead of cement sidewalks, residences, schools, churches, electric lights, automobiles and the many things that are visible to the naked eye from this hill today; he saw, 62 years ago a dark and impenetrable looking forest with an irregular line running through it marking the course, of our beautiful Saugeen river. Here and there he saw the smoke from some of the pioneers log cabins welcoming him to this promised land which for the remainder of his life he was to call home. The male population numbered 7 and many of the names of these optimistic pioneers are still familiar. They were Joseph Walker, from whom the town derived its name, John Bolton, John Shannon, John Lundy, Moses Stewart, and Tom Bilkie who left his name on one of our hills, and Malcolm McLean, who for more than half a century was our first postmaster. Mr. McPhail decided not to locate in Walkerton. He located with his father and brother John, who still survives him, on the hill back of Stemmiller's mill pond in Carrick. When you took a grist to the mill in those days, you carried your wheat on your back to Durham, the nearest mill. Later he located on the 12th, concession and through his perseverance and industry, developed one of the finest farms in Carrick. Three years ago he located in Walkerton. He was a staunch Liberal in politics, in religion a Presbyterian. He leaves to his posterity an unimpeachable character. He is survived by his wife and four daughters, Mrs. W. L. McClary of British Columbia, Mrs. Wm. Taylor of Mildmay, Mrs. Sebastian Kirstine of Brant, Mrs. Albert Taylor of Otter Creek and one son, Dr. J. A. McPhail of Blanchester, Ohio.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

"What is his name?"

"I do not know."

"Ah," said the doctor, "it is not known who the artist is, then."

"But he lives in the village," replied the cure, "and—"

A look of surprise crossed the doctor's face and he said quickly:

"He has lived here about two months, is it not so?"

The traveller, reflecting for a moment, said to himself in a low voice: "Can it be possible?" Then aloud: "Do you know even his Christian name?"

"Yes, Monsieur, he is called Pierre."

"And he has chestnut hair, blue eyes, a blonde mustache, and is of medium height," said the traveler quickly.

"A blonde mustache? No," said the priest, "but his eyes are blue, and he is not above medium height."

"It is he, it must be he," cried the doctor. "And then there is no one but himself who could paint this Resurrection."

"You know this young man, then?" said the priest. "Ah, if you would be so good as to inform us——"

"Who he is? I cannot do that, since it is his wish to remain unknown. But I may at least tell you that the artist who has done these paintings for you is one of the most promising of the younger painters of the French school—But I must see him; where is he?"

"He is away for a few days."

"Away? And we are going to-morrow! No matter. I must leave a sign of my presence here for him."

He took a pencil from his pocket-book, and proceeded to write on the whitewashed wall, first saying to the priest:

"Will you permit me, Monsieur le Cure?"

"Go on," answered the latter.

Then the stranger wrote these words below the "Resurrection" painted by Pierre:

"Et idem resurrexit Petrus," and underneath, "Davidoff."

Then turning to the cure: "When he returns," he said, "show him these words. He will know what they mean."

He then took leave of the priest, and returning to the inn, said to his companion:

"My dear count, you made a mistake in not coming out with me; you have missed something very curious."

"What is that?"

"I will tell you when we are on board. While we are here it must be a secret."

The two travellers then lighted their cigars, entered the carriage, and proceeded on their way.

The next day but one, Pierre returned from his expedition with the brother-in-law of Agostino, bringing with him a pair of pretty silver carrings for Marietta and a buckle for her mother. He breakfasted early, and was proceeding to work, when the cure, pushing open the glass door of the parlor, entered.

"Ah, Monsieur le Cure;" cried Pierre. "To what are we indebted for this pleasure?"

"A message with which I have been intrusted for you."

"Ah! And by whom?"

"A stranger."

Pierre's forehead clouded, and in a voice that trembled slightly, he said:

"Let me hear what it is."

"If you will accompany me to the church," said the priest, "you will learn it more quickly and more fully than I could tell you."

"I am at your orders."

He took his hat and went out with the priest.

For some time they walked on in silence. As they were nearing the great square the cure said:

"A stranger has been looking at your painting, and he has assured me that you have enriched our church with a picture of great value."

Pierre did not answer. He nodded without speaking and hastened his steps as if eager to learn what was awaiting him.

He crossed the nave of the church, stopped before his "Resurrection," and with an emotion which he could not conceal read the Latin inscription on the wall :"Et idem resurrexit Petrus. —Davidoff." He heaved a sigh, repeated in a choking voice, "Davidoff," and then relapsed into silence.

The cure, translating the Latin phrase, said behind him:

"'And in the same way, Pierre has arisen from the dead.' Then a miracle has been wrought for you? My dear child, we must praise the mercy of God."

Pierre passed his hand over his forehead, smiled at the priest; who regarded him with astonishment, and in a grave voice said:

"Yes, a miracle has been wrought for me, and God be praised for it."

He relapsed once more into silent meditation as if he were recalling the past. Then he said softly:

"Monsieur le Cure, I thank you for having taken this trouble. What you have told me has a profound interest for me. Au revoir, Monsieur le Cure."

And with a slow step and eyes bent upon the ground, he returned to the house of Agostino's mother.

On the following day one of the acolytes brought him a letter which had been posted at Ajaccio, bearing this address:

"Monsieur Pierre, care of Monsieur le Cure de Torrevecchia."

He opened the letter with emotion. It contained these lines:

"My Dear Friend:—You are still among the living; a more agreeable surprise could not have awaited me. It was I who performed the painful task of taking to Beaulieu the note in which you announced your fatal resolution, which happily was not carried out. He to whom you bequeathed your soul, whether by a miracle or through the power of imagination, suddenly felt a renewal of life and is now almost restored to health. But one who is closely connected with him came near losing her life in consequence of the news of your death. In the depths of your retreat, know that you passed close to happiness without perceiving it, but that it is still in your power to obtain it.

"Your sincere friend,

"Davidoff."

Having read the letter, Pierre folded it, put it into his pocket and left the house. He walked thoughtfully along the road to Bastia, pausing when he reached the shore. The calm blue sea sparkled in the sunshine, far as the eye could reach. The vessels in the distance, their sails shining in the sunlight, glided along so slowly as to seem almost motionless. The young man sat down on a rock, and, as on the evening when he had contemplated suicide, he fell into a revery. Slowly the image of Jacques rose before him, his face no longer pale and gloomy, but radiant with health and youth. He walked with buoyant step on the verdant terrace of the house at Beaulieu. All nature had awakened at the balmy breath of spring, and Jacques, like the plants and the flowers, seemed animated with new life. Suddenly Juliette appeared beside him, and now it was she who was ill and sad. Under her beautiful eyes were black rings, her cheeks were hollow, and in her smile there was the heart-rending sweetness of a last farewell.

A shudder passed through Pierre. It seemed to him as if the gaze of the young girl, fixed upon the sea, sought vainly in its blue waters for something that was not there. He saw this girl whose affection, reciprocated for a moment, he had afterward disdained, dying slowly of grief for his loss. He heard a voice murmur beside him: "It is you who are the cause of her tears, of her suffering, of her languor. You have just heard it—she is dying because she believes that you are dead. You had but to utter a word, and this innocent heart, filled with your image, would have opened to receive you. You had happiness and peace in your grasp, but you flung them recklessly away. Why delay longer in trying to regain them? Will you let her whom you love perish? You have only to go to her and she will revive again. Come, begin life anew. The future is yours, since you are loved."

He heaved a sigh and tears sprang to his eyes—the first he had shed since the tears of rage and shame of which Clemence Villa had been the cause. But he did not long give way to his emotion. He wished to examine his own heart, and judge himself with impartial severity. Was he purified and regenerated by this voluntary withdrawal from all he had held dear? If temptation came in his way would he have the strength to resist it? He trembled. A pale, dark face with gleaming eyes rose before him. From its lips came a sardonic burst of laughter as on the night when he had resolved to end his life. What was she laughing at, showing her white teeth and the dimples at the corners of her mouth? Was it at him? Was she then so sure of her power to bring him to her feet, the day she should take it into her head to do so? Was he, then, her slave?

He feared so—his weakness had been so great, his follies so disastrous, his cowardice so complete, his fall so low. At the thought of again coming into the toils of this cruel and heartless woman a cold sweat broke out upon his forehead and his heart beat with anguish. He fancied if he saw death before him a second time he would again choose it in preference to such humiliation. He dropped his head between his hands dejectedly, and, gazing at the sea which was now reddened by the splendors of the sunset, surrounded by the peace and the grandeur of nature, he fell into a revery.

Gradually his thoughts grew clearer, and he, who had not prayed since his childhood, seeing himself so solitary, so sad and so forsaken, raised his eyes to heaven in prayer. He asked nothing for himself. However hard and wretched his own lot might be, he accepted it without a murmur. But this pure and gentle creature, was she not innocent of blame, and did she not deserve to be spared from suffering. For her he implored hope and peace. Since he had the happiness to be loved by her, let her at least be endowed with the strength to live until his heart should be washed free from its stains. Could Divine Justice refuse her this peace? In the midst of the solitude surrounding him he allowed himself to utter a few words of prayer.

Suddenly his attention was arrested by an occurrence which symbolized in an instant his fears and hopes.

From a point of rock jutting out into the sea at his feet a dove had just flown in terror. An eagle followed close behind trying to capture her. She made desperate efforts to escape, but the bird of prey gained upon her steadily, uttering a shrill cry at every stroke of his powerful wings. Pierre, struck by the sight, said to himself, "Let this be a sign. If the eagle captures his prey, all is over with Juliette and me. If the dove succeeds in escaping, then I may hope to appear before her again, worthy of happiness."

From the moment in which he thus succinctly formulated the problem of his destiny Pierre, in breathless suspense, followed with his eyes the conflict between the two birds. The eagle had lowered his flight, and was now close to the dove and almost directly above her, menacing her with his sharp beak and livid claws. Terrified, the poor bird directed its flight toward a clump of oaks, hoping to take refuge there. But her ferocious enemy, divining her intention, hastened his flight toward her. Pierre, his heart oppressed, his hands trembling, longed to give some of his strength to the dove: he saw the moment approach in which she must succumb to her pursuer. Just as the rapacious bird was about to seize his victim, a shot was heard. The eagle turned over in the air mortally wounded, and fell to the ground, and the dove, saved from his clutches, disappeared among the trees.

Pierre uttered a cry of joy. The response to his question had been decisive and immediate. Destiny had interposed in his favor in an undeniable manner. The invisible marksman whose intervention had thus settled the question, had he not been guided to the spot in order to put an end to Pierre's anguish? But by a sudden return of his former mocking humor he began to laugh at the thought that a shot fired at a bird should thus be the arbiter of his fate. He shook his head.

"Work, that is the true panacea," he said. "The day I abandoned it, I was lost. I have returned to it, it will save me."

The sun sank into the sea, red as fire. Pierre rose and returned to the village with a more tranquil heart.

CHAPTER IV.

It was the first Sunday of the Carnival, and the Casino at Nice, splendidly illuminated, was thrown open for the grand veglione. In the Place Massena a crowd of curious spectators were watching the masqueraders entering the building, grouped around the burlesque throne on which King Carnival, in his spangled robes, had been sitting solemnly for two days past, the sceptre of Folly in his hand. The strains of the band filled the air, and the gay measures of waltz and quadrille, drowned by the buzzing of the crowd that ceaselessly surged through the vast edifice given up to bursts from time to time.

From the outside the scene looked like a gay parterre. A crowd of elegantly dressed figures, some with masks and some without (and all wearing dominos, of various colors, passed back and forth in the great hall, with bursts of laughter and lively repartee. In the room where the orchestra was stationed, dancing was going on, in the boxes conversation and intrigue. All the lovely and seductive women of Monaco, Nice, and Cannes were here assembled to delight the eye.

In a corner of the room, leaning against the wall, Prince Patrizzi stood chatting and watching the coming and going of the dominos as they passed through the hall. With the help of the gay friends who surrounded him, he amused himself in guessing the names of the women who participated in the gayeties of the night under cover of their masks. He had already succeeded in guessing several, when suddenly he uttered an exclamation of surprise:

"Why, there is Jacques de Vignes!" he cried.

It was indeed Jacques, animated and erect, his complexion fresh, his eyes clear. His blue domino floated behind him, giving him the air of a gallant cavalier of the Renaissance. He came forward to meet them half-way, his hand extended, smiling and happy, as he had been before his illness; not haggard and weary looking, as he was on the evening, some months before, on which Dr. Davidoff had related his fantastic stories after a gay dinner. The transformation was complete. Triumphant, almost insolent, he seemed in the splendor of his youth and health so miraculously regained.

"You are entirely recovered, Jacques?" asked the Prince.

"Entirely," said the young man, "as you see."

"All honor be to the climate that has restored you to yourself and us, for you were a jolly fellow, and you will be one again."

The young man leaned against the column beside Patrizzi, and letting his eyes wander over the motley crowd, that streamed by noisily,—

"And I enjoy life, my dear Prince," he said, with ardor, "like a man who knows what it is to have almost lost it. You have never been seriously ill; you do not know the melancholy languor that takes possession of the spirit as the strength of the body decreases. It seems as if a black veil covered all nature, so sombre and desolate does everything appear. The moments in which one might be happy are poisoned by the thought that they may perhaps be the last we shall enjoy, and the more beautiful and peaceful one's surroundings are the more does one execrate them. You may believe what I say, for I have experienced it. There can be nothing more cruel or more melancholy. So that now, after the hell through which I have passed, I am in paradise. Everything pleases, captivates, enchants me. I have learned the value of happiness, and I know how to enjoy it. The sun seems to me milder, the flowers more fragrant, the women more charming than before. I was on the brink of the grave, and thence springs my love for life."

"That's right," said Patrizzi; "it is pleasant to hear you. But your recovery 's truly miraculous. Now that I come to think of it—what wonderful story is that we heard about it? Did some one make you a present of a new soul? Davidoff pretends that it is not you who are alive, but your friend Laurier, and he adds that you are very lucky in the change, for Pierre was of the stuff that centenarians are made of."

The prince gave a burst of laughter which made Jacques turn pale, and called the moisture to his brow.

"I beg of you," said the young man, "not to speak of that again: it is very painful to me. Laurier was the friend of my childhood, and his loss will be long and deeply felt by me. If the case had been reversed and it were I who had given my life to him, the world would have gained by the change, for Pierre was an artist of indubitable genius, and I shall never be worth anything."

As he uttered these words, feverishly and in a trembling voice, Jacques' pallor increased. His gaze was clouded, and his features suddenly seemed to contract, giving greater prominence to the cheek-bones and the teeth.

He was seized with a sort of trembling as if he had a fever. He bit his lips, which had become livid, and tried to smile. But for a moment, as if in a vision of death, he presented to his friends, instead of his former healthy and happy look, the ghastly appearance of a dying man.

A moment later the blood returned to his cheeks, his look brightened, and Jacques was once more what he had been before, brilliant and haughty. He seemed to wish to shake off a painful impression, and taking a turn in the room he cried, with a gaiety that was somewhat forced:

"What a lovely evening, made indeed for pleasure! In the street all is noise and gaiety, and here everything is lovely and seductive."

As he ceased speaking, a white domino, emerging from a group, approached him, and said in a disguised voice:

"Lovely and seductive! Let us see if your acts will accord with your words."

Through her mask, the domino fixed upon Jacques a brilliant glance. The young man felt a supple arm slip through his own, and he asked gaily:

"Are you in the humor for an adventure? Well, then, capture me and I will be your slave; the one no doubt will be as easy as the other."

The domino gave him a slight tap on the cheek with her fan and answered:

"I forgive you the impertinence for the sake of the compliment."

Jacques looked at his friends with a malicious smile, and slipped through the crowd with his conquest leaning on his arm.

"Well, Patrizzi, you who have guessed the names of so many women, tell us that of the woman who has carried away De Vignes?"

"Parbleu! May the devil fly away with me if it is not Clemence Villa!"

"She has soon forgotten that poor Laurier," said one of the group surrounding the prince.

A Smile or Two.

"Last summer I was engaged to a girl I met here named Louise. See, I cut an 'L' in this tree." "How does that interest me?" "It's like this, Edythe: I could easily change that 'L' into an 'E.'"—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

"Going to spend the summer at a watering place?" inquired the first New York broker. "You might call it that," answered the other one. "I am going to stay right here on the stock exchange."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Are you putting away something for a rainy day, Tommy?" asked the little boy's aunt as she saw him at his little savings bank. "No, ma'am," was Tommy's reply, "there ain't no ball game on rainy days."—Yonkers Statesman.

"Tell me about your aunt, old Mrs. Blank. She must be rather feeble now." "We buried her last year." "Buried her? Dear me! Is the old lady dead?" "Yes; that's why we buried her."

"Summer has its inconveniences." "I don't get you." "I was just thinking of the vestless man who tried to carry a lead pencil a fountain pen, his watch and his cigars in the top pocket of his coat." —Detroit Free Press.

"I don't care for these vicious plays." "But they sometimes point a moral." "Well, when I want a moral I can get a seat in the police court for nothing. So what's the use of coughing up $2? I'll save my money for a musical comedy."—Pittsburg Post.

Minard's Liniment Lumberman's Friend.

Life Lengthens, Not Old Age.

The mean expectation of life at birth in the case of males, as shown by the last English life table (1891-1900), is 44-13 years, as contrasted with 39.91 years' value given in the life table based on the experience of 1838 to 1854.

But we have no proof that this increase is due to any circumstances affecting the conditions of life of adults, because the mean after lifetime of persons over 45 in both sexes, and over 35 in the case of males, has either remained sensibly constant or even diminished. For instance in the case of males the expectation of life at the age of 35, as shown in the last life-table is 29.21 years; the 1838-1855 table gives 29.40. At the age of 45 the corresponding figures are 22.20 and 22.76; at the age of 55, 15.79 and 15.45, and at the age of 65, 10.31 and 10.82.

A partial explanation is offered by the probability that many weaklings who were formerly destroyed by zymotic diseases of tuberculosis in early life now survive to adult age, and that the life table values reflect the consequence of this slackening of selection. — London Times.

BACK YARD GARDENS.

Simple Instructions for Those Interested in Doing Their Part to Increase Production.

The crop should be arranged to have the slope, as pertains to height of crop, towards the south. That is the tall vegetables, as corn, should be at the north, while the low- growing plants should be at the south, to allow as much sunlight as possible to enter.

Seeds—It always pays to get the best seed. Buy from a reliable firm.

Soil Preparation—Put the soil into the best physical condition possible, that is, have it finely pulverized before planting the seeds. Free the soil from rocks, sticks, large clods, strawy matter, etc. If the soil is heavy clay it will be improved by adding a little sand and some well rotted manure. It is better that the soil be ploughed or spaded in the fall. If, however, it has not been previously worked, up apply rotted manure if available and turn the soil well over in the spring, and, if in sod, turn the sod well under and pack down. Then prepare a fine seed bed on the surface.

Sowing—The hardier seeds such as peas, spinach, radishes, lettuce, carrots, and onions may be sown as early as the ground is ready. The tender seeds such as corn, cucumbers and beans should not be planted until the ground is warm and the danger from frost is past. When planting, cover seed uniformly and then firm the soil over them. This hastens germination. Lettuce, spinach, radishes, carrots and onions may be covered one-half inch in depth, beets one inch; while corn, beans, peas and cucumbers may be sown from one and one-half to two inches deep. Sown plenty of seed and thin out after the plants are up.

Thinning—Spinach need not be thinned. Beets may be thinned to about three inches apart, and those thinned out used as greens. Carrots may be thinned to two or three inches apart, beans to four inches and peas to one inch apart.

Corn may be planted in hills about three feet apart and thinned to three or four good plants to a hill. Cucumbers may be planted in the south row of corn between the hills and thinned to two or three plants in each space.

The crops here mentioned are likely to be successful with the amateur gardener, and as he gains experience he will be able to plan and manage a garden which will more fully suit his location and the requirements of his table.

A border of flowers will add much to the attractiveness of the backyard and may be arranged according to individual taste. A garden the size of the one here shown, if on good soil and properly cared for, will yield an abundant supply of fresh vegetables for the table of an average family during the entire growing season.

THE FORTUNATE FARMER.

(Brantford Expositor)

The entire wheat crop of Western Canada will be sufficient to feed a population of approximately 34 millions.

To estimate, at this season of the year, the money value of this crop is dangerously akin to counting chickens still in the incubator, but all signs point to prosperity on the farm encqualled in the history of the West. Not only will the farmer have more wheat to sell, but he is gradually bringing every branch of agriculture on to a sounder basis, particularly by diversifying his interest and giving more and more attention to stock-raising and dairying. His prosperity will be reflected in every line of legitimate trade.

PROSPERITY AND BOOZE.

(Collier's)

If the liquor question is to be argued as a matter of mere dollars and cents, don't accept "statistics" that seem to show that prosperity follows the booze wagon. Prosperity can't be tapped at any bar at all, and never could. Statistics that prove the contrary are, to put it kindly, pifflicated. If you live in a prohibition township, and don't know what "pifflicated" means, well, just substitute jugged, jagged, soaked, stewed, bleary, pie-eyed, or pickled. These are all good words in the gin belt.

Cover Your Bottles With Leather.

In carrying a small bottle, for instance, of medicine on a voyage, it is an excellent plan to make a leather covering for it, and this is easily done. In this way if the bottle breaks there is no danger from the wounds caused by the glass, and the cover acts as a good protector. For a square section bottle, trace the profile on a piece of leather four times side by side, and add the small square representing the bottom to one of the profiles. Cutting out with the scissors, this makes only one seam at the end to be sewed up, also the parts at the neck of the bottle and the bottom piece.

Minard's Liniment used by Physicians

New Use for Flower Pots.

Pierre Lord, an American of French ancestry, has just found that an ordinary red clay flower-pot can be made use of to keep water, butter and other things at refrigerator temperatures in tropical climates or the hottest of August days.

While an ordinary flowerpot will do, any sore of clay jars, porous vessels or common unglazed earthenware pots and receptacles may answer.

All you need do is to moisten a rag or bag cloth with strong salt water and keep it over the top of the flowerpot. The ends should dip down into a soup dish or basin on which the flowerpot stands. This training dish must be kept full of water all the time. A dark, cool pantry, just where you would keep an ice cooler or a refrigerator, is a good place to keep the clay jar or pot.

Another way described by C. F. Saunders is to wrap a layer of burlap around a porous jar. The water or butter or what not is put in the jar and it is exposed to a current of air, say, on a dark window sill with windows open and shutter closed.

The water inside the porous pot perspires its way in a microscopic moisture through to the outer surface. The ragbag or burlap maintains such a slow rate of evaporation that the pot is kept cold and this cools the contents.

This use of flowerpots to make ice water can be made valuable not only to every home and boarding house in the land but in times of ice famine on trains, in deserts, on the baseball field and in the pantries and kitchens of hotels and other places.

A simple little laboratory experiment really confirms the principle behind these practical discoveries. If you take an ordinary bath thermometer and cover it with a moist cloth all you need do to show how the mercury will fall is to fan it, blow gently upon it or stand it at a window crack. The mercury will begin to fall just as it does in January. As you blow the evaporation of the moisture in the cloth goes on and this cools the thermometer.

Roquefort Sheep.

The milk of a single Roquefort sheep will in a year provide from thirty to forty pounds of cheese. In that district of France there are about 8,-000 sheep devoted to the sheep industry.

AUTO ROAD HOGS.

(London Advertiser)

This phrase "making them step lively" is the slogan of too many men who drive motor cars. In fact it becomes more and more apparent that car owners regard those who travel afoot, whether through inclination or otherwise, as a great herd to be, "shoved" out of the way like so many chickens by the scream of a "warning" signal.

The blatant "warning" signal is too often a "command" signal, a sort of make-way-for-the-rajah injunction to to those who still proceed on shoe leather.

While the majority of motor owners are considerate and unwilling to force a path by fear of death, there are many persons who should not be trusted behind a wheel. It makes them impertinent and causes them to affect a superiority that is not at all warranted. They try too much to "make them step lively."

The man afoot has more than an equal ownership of the streets with the man in the car.

MOTHERS OF LITTLE ONES.

No mother of young children should be without a box of Baby's Own Tablets. The Tablets are mothers best friend and are as good as a doctor in the house. Concerning them Mrs. F. The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

GUARD THE BIRDS.

(Philadelphia Record)

There are not enough birds in the country. The more birds the fewer insects pests. Even the unpopular sparrow does more good than harm. It is estimated that there are only 60 birds to the square mile, the number, contrary to general belief, being greater in populous areas than in the forests.

Dissolve potassium sulphocyanate in water, and slowly add this to the other solution, until after stirring, a red color remains. WHAT GERMANY THINKS.

An American citizen who has been in Germany almost since the war began says that there is plenty of food in that country, that there is no lack of employment, and that there are no strikes. He says that there are plenty of young men to be seen walking along the streets. He says the Germans say that they cannot be starved out. We believe that, as far as food is concerned, but they can be starved for munitions of war. Still they are apparently very anxious to get wheat from the United States. This same American admits that there is a change of feeling among the Germans as to the outcome of the war. Some even yet think that they will dictate peace terms at London, but the better informed believe that they cannot now win. They also believe that they cannot be beaten. They point to the fact that their troops are still in France and Belgium, and that it will cost an enormous number of lives to drive them back to the Rhine, and they believe that the war will be a drawn affair, with a patched up peace at the end.

Against this this American traveller warns Great Britain. He quotes a business man who, he says, voices German feeling, that Germany would immediately begin to prepare for another war this time against Britain. The German hatred of Britain and the British, he declares, is unbelievable. It is a mad, foaming-at-the-mouth hatred, that nothing but revenge can extinguish. It is common belief that the Germans would willingly make peace with France and Russia so that they could hurl their whole force against Britain. Their hatred is accounted for because she stepped in between her and her prey, and thwarted her plans of Germany over all. Any kind of a peace made without thoroughly thrashing Germany will be a mistake, so far as Britain is concerned, says this American gentleman. To make "easy terms of peace" would be the worst thing Britain could do. Britain must show Germany in an unmistakable manner that she cannot play the bully in Europe while Britain is around. To go only half way in beating the Kaiser would only mean another war in the near future.

WHERE IS THE BRITISH NAVY?

Some of our American contemporaries have harsh things to say about the British navy in connection with the tragedy of the Lusitania, sneering at it as if it were of no account. But those who know the work the fleet is doing know better. The London Telegraph says that 'no details are available of the working of the great naval machine, but they know that it is at work.' We know, it says, that far away north, within a comparatively few degrees of the Pole, our men of war are on watch and ward, amid the ice and snow; the same patient, vigilant, ceaseless activity is being shown in the North Sea, the Mediterranean, and in all the other oceans. If we could be provided with a cinema film to vast extent we should have an eloquent record of the incidents which are occurring in the seven seas from day to day. The silence of our sea power testifies to the success with which, north, south, east and west, we have imposed our will on the enemy. We began the war with a material ascendancy; this has been reinforced and strengthened by a sense of moral superiority. The silence speaks of conditions so overwhelmingly in our favor that the enemy dare not contest our rule in any one of the vast ocean spaces of the world. It may be said that the submarine blockade in British waters is an exception to the general rule. But so far it has not in the least affected the military situation. It is common knowledge that, under difficulties which all allies appreciate, the British navy is coping with a situation which could not have been foreseen. We have full confidence that, in spite of exhibitions of 'frightfulness' by the Germans, the silent pressure of sea power is being relentlessly exerted against our enemies to their eventual [illegible]ding. In complete harmony the [illegible] and military forces are working [illegible] behalf, the navy bearing the [illegible] on its back and supplying the [illegible] while at the same time [illegible]ing to us in the homeland food [illegible] material in abundance. And [illegible] Britain's sea power that will [illegible]ly bring Germany to her knees.

Is Jane Addams as sure now that she wants peace as she was before the sinking of the Lusitania?

◆◆◆

The Ross rifle factories are turning out [illegible] thousand rifles a month. This is better, but not enough.

◆◆◆

If, as Lord Haldane says, Britain is thinking of conscription, the question arises — Is Canada doing all she could?

◆◆◆

There are said to be nearly two hundred and fifty steel and machine plants throughout Canada engaged in the manufacture of shells for the allies. This should help some.

◆◆◆

The Port Arthur authorities ask that the interned aliens be sent up there to clear the land instead of being kept down east eating their heads off in idleness. The request should be granted.

◆◆◆

If it be true that a German submarine prevented a British ship from going to the assistance of the Lusitania, it only shows that the Germans wanted to drown those on board as well as sink the ship.

Sir Edgar Speyer, a German naturalized British subject and great financial magnate, has resigned his Privy Councillorship and his baronetcy, because of charges of disloyalty made against him in Britain. Will he now be interned?

Does anyone doubt that a general election in Canada would be demanded by the Liberal opposition if the opposition had a ghost of a chance of winning?—London Free Press.

Last year, before the war was thought of, the Liberals challenged the Government to go to the country, but it was afraid and refrained. Nothing has occurred since then to make the Liberals doubt their success in an appeal to the people.

◆◆◆

According to a Paris despatch, says the New York Sun, several important American contracts have been cancelled because the goods delivered were not equal to sample. In some cases they were the direct contrary of what was stipulated in the contract. For instance, 150,000 pairs of socks, which were to be 70 per cent. wool and 30 per cent. cotton, were found to be 70 per cent. cotton and 30 per cent. wool. This shows that the grafters are not all Canadians.

◆◆◆

The Hon. Robert Rogers is not so sure now about the country clamoring for an election. His own organ in Winnipeg quotes him as saying:

"It would, indeed, be impossible for anyone to appreciate and to respect more than I do the genuine expressed sentiment [illegible] opposed to a general election. This is undoubtedly the sentiment that should properly exist. At the same time it must be borne in mind that we are at war and have to deal with the most trying conditions that the Canadian people have ever been called upon to deal with."

◆◆◆

The Buffalo Courier has been squinting through pro-German spectacles at the European war, and it comes to the conclusion that Britain is not putting up the fight it might have been expected to do. It points to her shortcomings and to the difficulties in the way with a sort of satisfaction that would please Dr. Dernburg. The Courier might now take a look at it from the other end, and tell us what Germany's chances are of scoring the great victory she started out to win.

◆◆◆

Ex-President Taft maintains the right of the United States to supply food and munitions of war to belligerent countries. He declared it to be [illegible]. "The rule has always been that neutrals could furnish arms and foodstuffs. As a nation we should not place ourselves at a disadvantage and take an opposite view of this question. We are always unprepared in case of war. We must always expect aid from neutrals in case of war. It would be an unwise policy, in my judgment, for us to abandon this rule."

◆◆◆

Sir Robert Borden, if he desired, could easily come to some arrangement with Sir Wilfrid Laurier to work together until the close of the war. Sir Wilfrid is willing, but Sir Robert apparently is not. It is now some time since Parliament adjourned, and he has had plenty of time to look over the situation and make up his mind as to the holding of an election. But he makes no sign. He cannot hold one in June now, but he may hold one in September, and so long as he keeps the country in ignorance of his intentions the Liberals may take it as an indication that he still intends to appeal to the country. Their duty is to prepare for an election. It cannot be far off anyway, if Sir Robert persists in ignoring Sir Wilfrid.

Could Hardly Straighten Up For Pain.

When the back becomes lame and starts to ache it is the sure sign of kidney trouble.

Doan's Kidney Pills cure the aching back by curing the aching kidneys beneath—for it is really the kidneys aching and not the back.

This is why "Doan's" cures are lasting—the medicine cures the actual cause of the disease, the kidneys.

Mr. J. W. Aylett, South Oshawa, Ont., writes: "I have much pleasure in recommending Doan's Kidney Pills. Last summer I suffered with a lame back. Sometimes I could hardly straighten up for the pain. I read about Doan's Kidney Pills and decided to give them a trial. I can truthfully say that the second box cured me. I can recommend them to all as a speedy cure to all sufferers with lame back."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

THE Changeling

Breakfast being over, George Douglas, who began to understand Madam Conway tolerably well, asked of her a private interview, which was granted, when he conciliated her first by apologizing for anything ungentlemanly he might have done in her house, and startled her next by asking for Theo, as his wife.

"You can," said he, "easily ascertain my character and standing in Worcester, where for the last ten years I have been known first as clerk, then as junior partner, and finally as proprietor of the large establishment which I now conduct."

Madam Conway was at first too much astonished to speak. Had it been Maggie for whom he asked, the matter would have been decided at once, for Maggie was her pet, her pride, the intended bride of Arthur Carrollton; but Theo was a different creature altogether, and though the Conway blood flowing in her veins entitled her to much consideration, she was neither showy nor brilliant, and if she could marry $200,000, even though it were American coin, she would perhaps be doing quite as well as could be expected. So Madam Conway replied at last, that "she would consider the matter and if she found that Theo's feelings were fully enlisted, she would perhaps return a favorable answer. I know the firm of Douglas & Co. by reputation," said she, "and I know it to be a wealthy firm; but with me, family is quite as important as money."

"My family, madam, are certainly respectable," interrupted George Douglas, a deep flush overspreading his face.

He was indignant at her presuming to question his respectability, Madam Conway thought, and so she hastened to appease him by saying, "Certainly, I have no doubt of it. There are marks by which I can always tell."

George Douglas bowed low to the far-seeing lady, while a train of thought, not altogether complimentary to her discernment in this case, passed through his mind.

CHAPTER XII.

Not thus lenient would Madam Conway have been toward Henry Warner, had he presumed to ask her that morning for Maggie, but he knew better than to broach the subject then. "He would write to her," he said, immediately after his return to Worcester, and in the meantime, Maggie, if she saw proper, was to prepare her grandmother for it, by herself announcing the engagement. This, and much more he said to Maggie, as they sat together in the library, so much absorbed in each other as not to observe the approach of Madam Conway, who entered the door just in time to see Henry Warner with his arm around Maggie's waist. She was a woman of bitter prejudices, and had conceived a violent dislike for Henry, not only on account of the stars and stripes, but because she read to a certain extent the true state of affairs. Her suspicions were now confirmed, and rapidly crossing the floor, she confronted him, saying: "Let my granddaughter alone, young man, both now, and forever."

Something of Hagar's fiery spirit flashed from Maggie's dark eyes, but forcing down her anger, she answered half earnestly, half playfully, "I am nearly old enough, grandma, to decide that matter for myself."

A fierce expression of scorn passed over Madam Conway's face, and harsh words might have ensued had not the carriage at that moment been announced. Wringing Maggie's hand, Henry arose and left the room, followed by the indignant lady, who would willingly have suffered him to walk, but thinking $200,000 quite too much money to go on foot, she had ordered her carriage, and both the senior and junior partner of Douglas & Co. were ere long riding a second time away from the old house and the mill.

"Grandma wishes to see you, Maggie, in her room," said Theo to her sister one morning, three days after the departure of their guests.

"Wishes to see me! For what?" asked Maggie, and Theo answered, "I don't know, unless it is to talk with you about Arthur Carrollton."

"Arthur Carrollton!" repeated Maggie. "Much good it will do her to talk to me of him. I hate the very sound of his name," and rising she walked slowly to her grandmother's room, where in her stiff brown satin dress, her golden spectacles planted firmly on her nose, and the Valenciennes border of her cap shading but not concealing the determined look on her face, Madam Conway sat erect in her high-backed chair, with an open letter upon her lap.

It was from Henry. Maggie knew his handwriting in a moment, and there was another, too, for her; but she was too proud to ask for it, and seating herself by the window she waited for her grandmother to break the silence, which she did ere long, as follows:

"I have just received a letter from that Warner, asking me to sanction an engagement which he says exists between himself and you. Is it true? Are you engaged to him?"

"I am," answered Maggie, playing nervously with the tassel of her wrapper, and wondering why Henry had written so soon, before she had prepared the way by a little judicious coaxing.

"Well, then," continued Madam Conway, "the sooner it is broken the better. I am astonished that you should stoop to such an act, and I hope you are not in earnest."

"But I am," answered Maggie, and in the same cold, decided manner her grandmother continued: "Then nothing remains for me but to forbid you having any communication whatever with one whose conduct in my house has been so unpardonably rude and vulgar. You will never marry him, Margaret, never! Nay, I would sooner see you dead than the wife of that low, mean, impertinent fellow."

In the large dark eyes there was a gleam decidedly Hagarish as Maggie arose and, standing before her grandmother, made answer: "You must not, in my presence, speak thus of Henry Warner. He is neither low, mean, vulgar nor impertinent. You are prejudiced against him because you think him comparatively poor, and because he has dared to look at me, who have yet to understand why the fact of my being a Conway makes me any better. I have promised to be Henry's Warner's wife, and Margaret Miller never yet has broken her word."

"But in this instance you will," said Madam Conway, now thoroughly aroused. "I will never suffer it; and to prove I am in earnest, I will here, before your face, burn the letter he has presumed to send you; and this I will do to any others which may come to you from him."

Maggie offered no remonstrance, but the fire of a volcano burned within, as she watched the letter blackening upon the coals; and when next her eyes met those of her grandmother, there was in them a fierce, determined look, which prompted that lady at once to change her tactics, and try the power of persuasion rather than of force. Feigning a smile, she said: "What ails you, child? You look at me like Hagar. It was hard, to be sure, perhaps, to burn your letter, and had I reflected a moment I might not have done so; but I cannot suffer you to receive any more. I have other projects in view for you, and have only waited a favorable opportunity to tell you what they are. Sit down by me, Margaret, while I talk to you on the subject."

The burning of her letter had affected Margaret strangely, and with a benumbed feeling at her heart, she sat down without a word, and listened patiently to praise long and praise loud of Arthur Carrollton, who was described as being every way desirable, both as a friend and a husband. "His father, the elder Mr. Carrollton, was an intimate friend of my husband," said Madam Conway, "and wishes our families to be more closely united, by a marriage between you and his son Arthur, who is rather fastidious in his taste, and though twenty-eight years old, has never yet seen a face which suited him. But he is pleased with you, Maggie. He liked your picture, imperfect as it is, and he liked the tone of your letters, which I read to him. They were so original he said, so much like what he fancied you to be. He has a splendid country seat, and more than one nobleman's daughter would gladly share it with him, but I think he fancies you. He has a large estate near Montreal and some difficulty connected with it will ere long bring him to America. Of course he will visit here, and with a little tact on your part you can, I'm sure, make one of the best matches in England. He is fine looking, too. I have his daguerreotype," and going to her work-box she drew it forth and held it before Maggie, who resolutely shut her eyes lest she should see the face of one she was so determined to dislike.

"What do you think of him?" asked Madam Conway, as her arm began to ache, and Maggie had not yet spoken.

"I haven't looked at him," answered Maggie. "I hate him, and if he comes after me, I'll tell him so, too! I hate him because he is an Englishman. I hate him because he is an aristocrat. I hate him for everything, and before I marry him I'll run away!"

Here, wholly overcome, Maggie burst into tears and precipitately left the room. An hour later and Hagar, sitting by her fire, which the coolness of the day rendered necessary, was startled by the abrupt entrance of Maggie, who, throwing herself upon the floor and burying her face in the old woman's lap, sobbed bitterly.

"What is it, child? What is it, darling?" asked Hagar, and in a few words Maggie explained the whole. She was persecuted—dreadfully persecuted. Nobody before ever had so much trouble as she. Grandma had burned a letter from Henry Warner, and would not give it to her. Grandma said, too, that she would never marry him, should never write to him nor see anything he might send to her. "Oh, Hagar, Hagar! Isn't it cruel?" and the eyes, whose wrathful, defiant expression was now quenched in tears, looked up in Hagar's face for sympathy.

The right chord was touched, and much as Hagar might have disliked Henry Warner, she was his fast friend now. Her natural opposition, and Maggie's tears had wrought a change and henceforth all her energies should be given to the advancement of the young couple's cause.

"I can manage it," she said, smoothing the long silken tresses which lay in disorder upon her lap. "Richland postoffice is only four miles from here; I can walk double that distance yet. Your grandmother never thinks of going there, neither am I known to any one in that neighborhood. Write your letter to Henry Warner, and before the sun goes down it shall be safe in the letter-box. He can write to the same place, but he had better direct to me, as your name might excite suspicion."

This plan seemed perfectly feasible, but it struck Maggie unpleasantly. She had never attempted to deceive in her life, and she shrank from the first deception. She would rather, she said, try to win her grandmother's consent. But this she found impossible. Madam Conway was determined, and would not listen.

"It grieves her sorely," she said. "Theo, too, enjoys her favorite, whom she loved better than her life, but twas for her good, and must be done."

So she wrote a cold and rather insulting letter to Henry Warner bidding him, as she had once done before, "let her granddaughter alone," and saying "it was useless for him to attempt anything secret, for Maggie would be closely watched the moment there were indications of a clandestine correspondence."

This letter, which was read to Margaret, destroyed all hope; and still she wavered, uncertain whether it would be right to deceive her grandmother. But while she was yet undecided, Hagar's fingers, of late unused to the pen, traced a few lines to Henry Warner, who, acting at once upon her suggestion, wrote to Margaret a letter which he directed to "Hagar Warren, Richland."

In it he urged so many reasons why Maggie should avail herself of this opportunity for communicating with him, that she yielded at last, and regularly each week old Hagar toiled through sunshine and through storm to the Richland postoffice, feeling amply repaid for her trouble when she saw the bright, expectant face which almost always greeted her return. Occasionally, by way of lulling the suspicions of Madam Conway, Henry would direct a letter to Hillsdale, knowing full well it would never meet the eyes of Margaret, over whom, for the time being, a spy had been set, in the person of Anna Jeffrey.

This young lady, though but lately connected with our story, may perhaps deserve a brief notice. Older than either Theo or Margaret, she was neither remarkable for beauty or talent. Dark haired, dark eyed, dark browed, and as the servants said, "dark in her disposition," she was naturally envious of those whose rank in life entitled them to more attention than she was herself accustomed to receive. For this reason, Maggie Miller had from the first been to her an object of dislike, and she was well pleased when Madam Conway, after enjoining upon her the strictest secrecy appointed her to watch that young lady, and see that no letter was ever carried by her to the postoffice which Madam Conway had not first examined. In the inky eyes there was a look of exultation as Anna Jeffrey promised to be faithful to her trust, and for a time she became literally Maggie Miller's shadow, following her here, following her there and following her everywhere, until Maggie complained so bitterly of the annoyance that Madam Conway at last, feeling tolerably sure that no counterplot was intended, revoked her orders, and bade Anna Jeffrey leave Margaret free to do as she pleased.

Thus relieved from espionage, Maggie became a little more like herself, though a sense of the injustice done her by her grandmother, together with the deception she knew she was practising, were upon her; and the servants at their work listened in vain for the merry laugh they had loved so well to hear. In the present state of Margaret's feelings, Madam Conway deemed it prudent to say nothing of Arthur Carrollton, whose name was never mentioned save by Theo and Anna, the latter of whom had seen him in England, and was never so well pleased as when talking of his fine country seat, his splendid park, his handsome horses, and last, but not least, himself. "He was," she said, "without exception, the most elegant and aristocratic young man she had ever seen;" and then for more than an hour she would entertain Theo with a repetition of the many agreeable things he had said to her during the one day she had spent at his house while Madam Conway was visiting there.

In perfect indifference, Maggie, who was frequently present, would listen to these stories, sometimes listlessly turning the leaves of a book, and again smiling scornfully as she thought how impossible it was that the fastidious Arthur Carrollton should have been at all pleased with a girl like Anna Jeffrey; and positive as Maggie was that she hated him, she insensibly began to feel a very little degree of interest in him, "at least, she would like to know how he looked;" and one day when her grandmother and Theo were riding, she stole cautiously to the box where she knew his picture lay, and, taking it out, looked to see "if he were so very fine-looking"— —if that, and sure that she hated him.

"Yes, he was," Maggie acknowledged, still she lingered long over that picture, admiring the classically-shaped head, the finely-cut mouth, and more than that, the dark eyes which seemed so full of goodness and truth. "Pshaw!" she exclaimed, at last, restoring the picture to its place, "if Henry were only a little taller, and had as handsome eyes, he'd be a great deal better looking. Anyway, I like him, and I hate Arthur Carrollton, who I know is domineering, and would try to make me mind. He has asked for my daguerreotype, grandma says, one which looks as I do now. I'll send it, too," and she burst into a loud laugh at the novel idea which had crossed her mind.

That day when Madam Conway returned from her ride, she was surprised at Maggie's proposing that Theo and herself should have their pictures taken for Arthur Carrollton.

"If he wants my picture," said she, "I am willing he shall have it. It is all he'll ever get."

Delighted at this unexpected concession, Madam Conway gave her consent and the next afternoon found Theo and Maggie at the daguerrean gallery in Hillsdale, where the latter astonished both her sister and the artist by declaring her intention of not only sitting with her bonnet and shawl on, but also of turning her back to the instrument! It was in vain that Theo remonstrated. "That position or none," she said. And the picture was accordingly taken, presenting a very correct likeness, when finished of a bonnet, a veil and a shawl, beneath which Maggie Miller was supposed to be.

Strange as it may seem, this freak struck Madam Conway favorably. Arthur Carrollton knew that Maggie was unlike any other person, and the joke, she thought, would increase rather than diminish the interest he already felt in her. So she made no objection, and in a few days it was on its way to England, together with a lock of Hagar's snow-white hair, which Maggie had coaxed from the old lady, and, unknown to her grandmother, placed in the casing at the last moment.

Several weeks passed away, and then there came an answer—a letter so full of wit and humor that Maggie confessed to herself that he must be very clever to write so many shrewd things, and be withal so perfectly refined. Accompanying the package was a small rosewood box, containing a most exquisite little pin made of Hagar's frosty hair and richly ornamented with gold. Not a word was written concerning it, and as Maggie kept her own counsel, both Theo and her grandmother marvelled greatly, admiring its beauty and wondering for whom it was intended.

"For me, of course," said Madam Conway. "The hair is Lady Carrollton's, Arthur's grandmother. I know it is, it's so soft, silky look. She has sent it as a token of respect, for she was always fond of me," and, going to the glass, she very complacently ornamented her Honiton collar with Hagar's hair, while Maggie, bursting with fun, beat a hasty retreat from the room lest she should betray herself.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson X. June 6, 1915.

Nathan Rebukes David.—2 Samuel 11: 1-12:7. Print 11: 22-12: 7.

Commentary.—I. David's grievous fall (11: 1-21). 1-5. When we contemplate the splendid character of David, and the glory of his many triumphs; when we survey at a glance his exaltation from a humble shepherd boy to the widely-honored king of Jehovah's people, and think of his many unrivaled excellences of mind and heart, we are ready to wish that his life had closed before these crimes of adultery and blood-guiltiness had polluted his mighty soul and darkened his life history with an ineffaceable stain.—Whedon. The history here recorded may be regarded as a strong argument in support of the authenticity of the scriptures. The sacred biographer did not in any sense try to cover up David's sins, nor did he seek to shield him from blame. He tells the story with a simplicity and a candor that convince the reader of its truthfulness. A writer who would make a hero of David would speak of his sins in milder terms or would pass over them altogether. David was of mature age and must have known well the consequences in one's life and influence of such a course as he contemplated. He allowed his passions to run riot, and he was plunged into infamy. His sin shows that good men must remember their liability to fall, and must be constantly watchful lest they yield to temptation. Bath-sheba, who was partaker of his sin, did not exercise becoming prudence. She exposed herself to the view of David, and she later seems to have offered no resistance to his desires; thus she contributed to the downfall of both.

6-21. One sin led to another, as is usually the case. Uriah, the husband of Bath-sheba, was one of David's most faithful and capable warriors. So devoted was he that he would not leave the king's service in time of war to enjoy the comforts of his home, even when urged to do so by the king. David became desperate, for the death penalty, the punishment for adultery, was likely to be inflicted upon Bath-sheba and himself. Uriah must be put out of the way that David might take his wife for himself. He would not slay him, but he would give instructions to Joab, the general of his army, to place him where he would be almost certain to lose his life. He thus became guilty of shedding innocent blood to cover his own guilt. Uriah was slain in the battle, for Joab followed the directions given him by David, and thus apparently became in some degree involved with David in the crime of murder. Dr. Clarke says, in summing up the whole affair: "For my own part, I must say that I pity David, I venerate Uriah, I detest Joab, and I think meanly of Bath-sheba; but while David was to be pitied, he deserved also to be strongly condemned, for of what greater sin could he have been guilty?"

II. Bath-Sheba becomes David's wife (11:22-27). 22. The messenger—Joab sent a messenger from Rabbah, a city of the Ammonites, twenty-two miles east of the Jordan, to David with word regarding the war which he was waging. The main purpose, however, in sending the messenger was to inform David that Uriah was dead. 23. Came out unto us—Joab with his army was besieging Rabbah and the men of the city made a sally against Joab's army. We were upon them—The army of Israel drove their assailants back to the gate of the city. 24. Shooters shot from off the wall—Joab appears to have shown poor military ability in sending his men so close to the wall of the city that they could be reached by the arrows of archers on the walls. Uriah....is dead—Joab had so carefully obeyed the king's orders that Uriah fell, and special mention is made of his death by the messenger. 25. Thus shalt thou say unto Joab—This message was dictated by an abominable hypocrisy. He would thus affect sorrow for the fall of the noble Uriah, and seek to cover his own guilt in the matter.—Whedon. One as well as another—Joab was thus approved by David, though David knew that a plot had been laid by him and Joab to have Uriah slain.

26. Mourned for her husband —How deeply Bath-sheba mourned for Uriah we can not know with certainty, but all the circumstances indicate that the mourning was mostly formal. Her infatuation had cost her her virtue and a noble husband. 27. When the mourning was past—The usual period of mourning was seven days. In the case of prominent persons it was thirty days. The length of time that widows should mourn for their husbands is nowhere stated. David sent ....and she became his wife—The guilty pair were acting contrary to all sense of propriety. They seemed to think their sin was not known and they would enjoy themselves in their new relation. Displeased the Lord—David had not yet settled with God. This record shows God's mind regarding David's course. God's displeasure was about to find expression in so emphatic a way that David would keenly realize the enormity of his sins.

III. David reproved (12: 1-7). 1. The Lord sent Nathan—Nathan was the prophet of the Lord to Israel. For a year David had been undisturbed in his sin by the prophet, but if his conscience had been slumbering it was now to be awakened. Two men in one city—In the parable the men represented David and Uriah. 2. Many flocks and herds—A parable well suited to a pastoral people. 3. One little ewe lamb—In striking contrast to the rich man's wealth. With his children—It was a pet lamb. The poor man had a wealth of affection for his small possession. 4. Took the poor man's lamb—The prophet was speaking a parable that must impressively show all the hatefulness of selfishness and injustice. 5. David's anger was greatly kindled—He could readily see the wickedness of the rich man and was justly incensed at the greedy man. As the Lord liveth—A form of oath or strong affirmation. 6. Shall restore the lamb fourfold—The Jewish law required a fourfold restoration for a sheep that had been taken wrongfully (Exod. 22: 1). David did not suspect that he was thus strongly condemning himself. The parable was having the designed effect. "It fastens on the essential guilt of David's sin, not its sensuality or its impurity, so much as its meanness and selfishness."—Stanley. 7. Thou art the man—All the guilt that David declared attached to the rich man in the story, rested upon himself. The prophet was fearless in his application of the truth, even if it involved the great king of Israel. This is an instance of the directness with which God deals with men. As Nathan proceeded with his account of David's sin, the king was conscience-smitten and confessed to the prophet, "I have sinned against the Lord." David's life was spared, but four of his sons died, —the first son of David and Bath-sheba, Amnon, Absalom and Adonijah. David found forgiveness, but the stain upon the page of his life's history was ineffaceable.

Questions.—Over what enemies did David's army triumph? Of what sins did David become guilty? How is his course a warning to us? How did God regard his acts? Whom did the Lord send to David? State the parables. What effect did the story have upon David? How did Nathan apply the parable?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Effectual reproof.

I. Revealed the man of sin.
II. Led to confession of sin.
III. Declared the effect of sin.

I. Revealed the man of sin. The moral and spiritual aim of Nathan's parable was to awaken in the king the general sense of outraged justice concerning his own conduct. David's sin was a breach of the commandment which guards human life, and was committed when God was prospering him in all his affairs, when his people were bravely risking their lives in defence of their country and after he had spent many years in fellowship with God. David's protracted labor of years had secured a compact kingdom with internal unity. Saul's family had been cared for. The government was organized and labor divided. The war with the Syrians was in the hands of a powerful force under a skillful general. David had leisure unknown in former years. In the exercise of his freedom and the abuse of his power, David disregarded the responsibilities of his office and fell from his moral elevation into the depths of sin to the verge of destruction. It was God's design that David's sin should be fully manifested to effect a perfect cure, therefore all his plans for concealment failed. David's endeavor to hide his transgression was a tacit acknowledgment of its disreputable character, beginning in lust and ending in murder. Nathan was not sent as a herald of vengeance, but to reprove and convince of sin. His parable touched upon the experience of David. He had known what it was to be poor. He knew what it was to possess and love the lambs. The wise prophet led David to pass unconscious verdict upon himself. The effect of the application of the parable is a remarkable illustration of the power of conscience. The force of truth came in the particular application of it. The wicked man upon the throne saw for the first time what sin really involved. It was guilt calculated upon, persisted in, covered up by sophistry and self-excusing. He had accomplished the death of his faithful servant Uriah, a brave soldier, whom he had sent without warning to his doom, through the help of Joab, an able, but unscrupulous, general and a ready accomplice in David's sin. In that fatal letter to Joab, David signed away his liberty and surrendered himself to his accomplice, who served him that he might gain power over him. David seemed to have lost sight of the one Witness of the whole transaction of his guilt. The most potent element in Nathan's utterance was the direct charge of God. His words contained no inquiry and a statement. It was a time of revelation, of probing and heart-searching.

II. Led to confession of sin. It became evident to David that his long-kept secret was known to his most influential and incorruptible subject and friend and that God was speaking directly to his conscience. The eye of conscience, turned in upon himself, gave fresh life to the old suppressed loyalty to righteousness and God, and as a consequence full confession came of his sin against God. The purpose of the parable was reached. He was self-convicted, self-condemned. His sense of sin was the beginning of his salvation. David saw himself as Nathan saw him and as God saw him. It was divine favor that sent Nathan. David's great sin was met and mastered by God's great grace. A vision of divine love melted the hardened heart. It was a rapid transition of feeling through which David passed from indignation at another's supposed sin to the acknowledgment of his own actual crime.

III. Declared the effect of sin. The change in David's moral condition had a pernicious influence ever after on his rule, in his court, on his private life and on the general prosperity of his kingdom. Loss of respect, loss of executive power, loss of influence was inevitable. His sin was the turning-point in his career, which was henceforth marked by a long series of calamities. Without giving the convicted king time to enlarge upon his confession, Nathan told of the retribution that was sure to come by the hand of God. He was to reap according to his sowing. Forgiveness would effect the restoration of favor and fellowship with God, which had been interrupted by sin, but its effects would be visited upon his family. T. R. A.

"MUST HAVE PARIS"

Two inhabitants of La Fere (Aisne Department) which is still in the hands of the Germans, who have just been sent back from Germany, report that the Germans have planted an immense area of wheat, oats and potatoes around the town and have cut down all the walnut and cherry trees for gunbarrel wood.

"About five weeks ago" said one of the men, the Kaiser arrived at La Fere with several staff officers. He remained for three days in that part of the district, but the inhabitants could never find out where he slept. They were able to see him quite closely and could see that he had grown noticeably older, and that in spite of the efforts he made appeared to be sad and preoccupied.

"He went each day to the esplanade where a military band played On the third day, before entering his automobile, he made a speech to the soldiers He did not hide from them the difficulties of the campaign. He said;

"If we have to burn our last cartridge and line up our last reserve, we shall go to Paris. We must have Paris."

SHOULD BE DISCOURAGED

The Listowel Banner in the following article voices the opinion of the merchants, not only in Listowel but in every rural town, in respect to the continuous solicitations for alms by the numerous beggars.

Petitions, petitions, petitions! There seems to be no end of them and if a merchant on main street skips a couple of weeks without seeing one he is fortunate in these days.

Some are quite legitimate and deserving of support but there are in this world many undeserving individuals, who make a lazy living by preying on the sympathies of the public, and the more a community "falls" for this sort of thing, the more it is advertised and the more it is pestered by such individuals, who should be discouraged in making nuisances of themselves.

On Friday last two more chaps hit Listowel with petitions. The one claimed to have tuberculosis and went through the business section soliciting funds with which he said he wished to purchase a ticket to his home in Winnipeg. How he came to wander this far from home he didn't say. But a little petition with a typewritten head and no explanation, was sufficient to elicit many contributions.

Another chap was apparently deaf and dumb. He also made the rounds and asked for money with which to place him in the deaf and dumb institute. The difficulty is in judging the merits of the different cases and some kind hearted people rather than risk disappointing a deserving creature give to anyone that comes along. Others look down the list, see the names of two or three they know and sign too, when it would have been better for them to have signed a "friend" than to have lent the influence of their name to one whom they are not certain is deserving.

There was a time when tramps were much more numerous than today. People got sick and tired of them and finally officials were instructed to look after them so that today the tramp typical of eight or ten years ago is a scarce article.

If, instead of encouragement similar objection was taken to undeserving individuals circulating petitions, they also would be much more scarce, and deserving persons need not necessarily, in that case be neglected.

The writer has seen to many evidences of swindling in this way to feel kindly disposed to the average stranger that a better and more reliable way could be devised for taking care of the causes these canvassers represent.

It was but of recent date that certain Armenian canvassers in this province were exposed for defrauding the public. They were highly organized and were doing business on a big scale, having agents covering territories. And, as usual they were able to present testimonials from reputable men who lent their influence without properly investigating them.

Placed for Collection.

Several of the accounts of subscribers to the Telescope whose subscriptions have got behind were handed to the Publishers Adjusting Association this week for collection. It was arranged however that the arrearage rate would not be charged on accounts paid before June 1st.

Got Fat on it.

R. E. Truax M. P. for South Bruce was in Chesley on Monday and the same evening attended a box social at Formosa at which his opponent, John Purvis, was auctioneer. Reuben doesn't let Jack get out of his sight when there is some big function on in this riding. The strenuous bye-election in Nov. 1913 would have killed most men of R. E. Truax's age, but he actually got fat, or as fat as he ever gets, by a whirlwind campaign in which he came out victorious against a strong opponent by a majority of 115.—Chesley Enterprise Promotion a Popular One.

In referring to the appointment of Judge Klein to the senior judgeship the Ripley Express says: Judge Klein was born in Alsace when that province belonged to France. He came to Canada at an early age. The appointment of Judge Klein as senior judge will be hailed with delight in this part of Bruce County. The universal opinion has prevailed that he not only deserved the promotion, but his experience and true character eminently fitted him for the position. The appointment is one most popular one that the Government has made in County Bruce.

Sudden Death in Culross.

Henry McKay an old and esteemed resident of Culross Township dropped dead at his home there on Sunday morning. He was about 80 years of age, and death was no doubt due to senile decay and heart failure. For many years the late Mr. McKay was prominent in the public life of the township, serving first as councillor and later for a number of years as reeve until he voluntarily retired. His outspoken and even pugnacious manner, though it made him many enemies commended him to the ratepayers who recognized in him an honest man and a faithful servant. For years after his retirement from municipal life a speech by McKay was a regular feature of the annual nomination meeting. In religion he was a presbyterian and in politics was an independent, having espoused the Patron movement of the early nineties.—Lucknow Sentinel.

Racial Riot in Chesley.

There was quite a mob on the streets late in the evg. of May 24th when Constable Kreigner was assaulted and forced to take refuge in his home where three windows were broken before the mob were satisfied. For some time there has been with a certain element quite a hostile feeling against constable Kreigner because he was helping to enforce the local option by-law and this was really at the bottom of the trouble and the fact that he is of German decent was put forth as the ostensible reason for the assault. Mr. Kreigner protests that he has never expressed pro-German sentiments. It looks as though Mr. Kreigner is being made to suffer for those who have been indiscreet enough to express pro-German views. The proper way to settle this anti-British talk is to send to the proper authorities the names of those who have been indulging in disloyal utterances and we understand this has been done and Mr. Kreigner's name is not on the list. But on no account must mob rule prevail. Law and order must be supreme in any community. The council will likely order an investigation and the blame for Monday's disturbance be placed where it belongs.—Chesley Enterprise.

NOTE During the first ten years of a Hospital's existence, a grant of 20 cents per day for all patients is made up to 120 days, thereafter at the rate of seven cents. After ten years the grant is only paid for patients for whose maintenance $7 per week or less is contributed. This accounts for our decreased grant this year. In the government report to Sep. 30th 1914, out of a total days' stay of 3708 days we were allowed 20 cents on 1770 days and 7 cents on 556 days, leaving 1373 days for which we received no grant.

The Trustees have to express their gratitude to the people of Bruce County for their continued valuable support during the past twelve months. We are particularly grateful to the County Councillors who have by financial assistance from year to year and no less by the strong interest taken in the hospital by successive Wardens and individual members of the Council, encouraged the board in their efforts to keep the Bruce County Hospital in the front rank of Provincial Hospitals. The constant help rendered by the ladies of the County, who last year gave us nearly $1100, is the subject of our warm admiration and appreciation.

Receipts from pay patients were $721.55 more than in the preceding year, evidencing growing confidence on behalf of the public and the medical practitioners of the County. On the other hand there was at the same time a rise in the cost of staple food stuffs with an increased number of mouths to feed, bringing the cost of maintenance up to $7505, or about $1400 more than last year. Included in this amount was expenditure of a more or less capital nature, amounting to about $400 for new house furnishings and improvements in the culinary and other departments.

In addition there has to be defrayed the cost of the new sterilizing plant estimated at about $1200. The Warden and many of the County Councillors paid a visit to the Hospital at the December session of the Council at our request. The urgent desire of the Superintendent and medical staff to see a thoroughly up-to-date plant installed was explained to them and as a result their generous grant of $500 at that session towards this equipment, encouraged the Board to undertake an expenditure which though apparently large, was entirely necessary and which places us on a par with all the Toronto and other large City hospitals in this particular. As a result we expect a considerable impetus to surgical work.

During the year there were treated 24 free patients, viz:

From	Albemarle Township	1
"	Brant (including 1 from House of Refuge, 28 days)	7
"	Bruce	1
"	Eastnor	1
"	Elderslie	2
"	Greenock	4
"	Huron	1
"	Kincardine	1
"	Saugeen	4
			24

These patients were 1711 days at the hospital, the average cost of patients per day was $1.65 so that the care of these patients represents an expense for board of $2872 in addition to which in many cases there were other out of pocket expenses amounting to $355, so that the total cost of this part of our work was $3227.

According to the last Government report the average cost of patients spread over all the Hospitals of Ontario including a number of Roman Catholic Institutions, where the cost of nursing is low, was $1.47.

ANY DYSPEPTIC CAN GET WELL

By Taking "Fruit-a-tives" Says Capt. Swan

Life is very miserable to those who suffer with Indigestion, Dyspepsia, Sour Stomach and Biliousness. This letter from Captain Swan (one of the best known skippers on the Great Lakes) tells how to get quick relief from Stomach Trouble.

PORT BURWELL, ONT., May 8th, 1913.

"A man has a poor chance of living and enjoying life when he cannot eat. That was what was wrong with me. Loss of appetite and Indigestion was brought on by Constipation. I have had trouble with these diseases for years. I lost a great deal of flesh and suffered constantly. For the last couple of years, I have taken "Fruit-a-tives" and have been so pleased with the results that I have recommended them on many occasions to friends and acquaintances. I am sure that "Fruit-a-tives" have helped me greatly. By following the diet rules and taking "Fruit-a-tives" according to directions, any person with Dyspepsia will get benefit".

Canadian Casualties 5,757.

Canadian casualties officially reported and recorded up to May 27th total 5,757. This includes 924 killed in action 3,616 wounded and 1,217 missing. All the casualties of Langemarck battle are not yet in. There are also casualties from more recent actions near Festubert among these being men who formerly belonged to 23rd, 30th and 32nd Battalions, which crossed to England in February, and have been used as reinforcements.

Presbyterian Hymn Book.

The committee appointed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church to take into consideration the revision of the book of Church Praise has completed its labors. The committee was able to meet in the main the suggestions sent up from the Presbyteries, and the book, as now adjusted, will, it is expected, meet with general acceptance. Rev. Mr. McMillan, the secretary of the committee, is now at work preparing the material for the printer, a task requiring time and patience. The committee gave the most scrupulous attention to all suggestions submitted for its consideration, and the Book of Praise in its final form should represent the views of the church as a whole.

The Tax Stamp.

The war tax stamp on bank checks is having other results than raising revenue. As was expected it has greatly reduced the number of checks issued. Many employers who formerly payed by checks are now paying cash. The Grand Trunk Railway has adopted this plan, as on the thousands of payments made by the company each month the two-cent charge on each check would amount to considerable. It is found cheaper to take the cash around after the fashion of years ago, and pay it out direct. This is by no means as good a way of doing business as by check, as the cancelled check is always a convenient voucher showing that payment has been made. The banks, however, we may suppose, will not object to the change, as it saves them the trouble of cashing and recording thousands of checks.

The Western Fair

The Western Fair of London, Ont., will maintain its reputation this year as being one of the best Live Stock Exhibitions of the Dominion of Canada. Live Stock Exhibitors are always loud in their praises of the treatment they receive at London and the amount of business they do there. Buyers are always plentiful surrounded as London is by the best Agriculture district of Canada. Although large cash additions have been made to the prize list for the past three years, this year will surpass them all when $3,000 will be added to the Live Stock and Poultry Departments. This has been made possible through the general assistance given by the Dominion Government. This amount has been distributed throughout the different classes and sections added, which will be of special interest to the farmers and live stock breeders. The prize lists will soon be ready for distribution. Send to the Secretary, A. M. Hunt, London, Ont. for prize list or any information regarding the exhibition.

Nearly Choked to Death.

A near fatality occurred Tuesday afternoon in Little England, Howard, the eleven year old son of Mr. J. E. Smith being the principle. The lad had just returned from school and was leading home a cow that had been pastured on the street. The rope was fastened about his body when the animal commenced to run throwing him to the ground. The rope slipped over the boy's shoulders and fastened around his neck. He was being dragged along the street in this way when when Mr. John Petch went to the rescue and saved the lad's life. His lips had already turned black.—Listowel Banner.

Large Order for Shells.

The Hunter Bridge & Boiler Co. have received an order for 25,000 shells at $6.00 a shell. They are of the 4.7 variety and are expected to be finished by October. The Hunter Co. will put night and day shifts to work on the order just as soon as possible. The Shell Committee reserve the right to cancel any portion of the order uncompleted on October 1st. It is not thought that much new machinery will have to be installed. The work comes in at a good time as there has been a heavy falling-off in the bridge and boiler business and the shops would practically have to close in consequence.—Kincardine Review.

Use of Gases.

Lord Kitchener's assurance that the British troops will use gases such as the Germans have used in Flanders will be welcomed. It is characteristic of Great Britain that a frank statement is made of her policy. Germany as usual subordinated every honorable consideration to military interest and introduced the foul practice by ambush. It is to be hoped that no sensitive observer in this country will raise his hands in horror at the sight of Great Britain's performances of her military duty in this matter. Gases may be used effectively as the Canadian troops at the front have reason to know. Great Britain did not want to use them any more than they wanted the war. Germany compelled war and Germany has compelled the general use of gases. It would be far more sensible for Great Britain to abandon the war than for her to refuse to furnish her soldiers with steel to meet the enemy's steel. Public opinion in this country will not cease to hope that Germany by using foul gases, has brought down on her head something she did not expect. The matter is in the capable hands of Lord Kitchener.

The Western University.

Another great stride will be taken by the Western University of London next year, as a result of a further assured increase in its income. The London City Council has voted a grant of $15,000 which will assure the Western a revenue of no less than $30,000 for its Arts Department as compared with $14,400 for the year just closing and $8800 the previous year. The total revenue available for all Department will be $75,000, which means a doubling of the income in the course of two years. Five new professors will be engaged at once, and two new science laboratories equipped. A good gymnasium has been secured and a well known instructor and director of athletics is being engaged. Plans for the coming year have already been submitted in outline to the Education Department, and it is understood they will be acceptable to the Department in granting the same recognition to all degrees as is given to the other universities. With this handicap removed and the new interest that is being awakened there are already indications of a greatly increased enrolment of students at the Western for the coming year especially as this is the nearest university for all Western Ontario students, and the expense of living in London is comparatively low.

Safety First.

Officers and employees of the Grand Trunk Railway are trying by every means in their power to prevent injuries to all persons—patrons employees and others. But on looking into this subject, they find that more than one-half of all persons killed on railways in Canada and United States are killed while trespassing on railway property. In this way in these two countries, fifteen persons are killed and about the same number injured for every day in the year. Perhaps you may think that the 11,000 or more persons meeting with casualties every year while trespassing on railways are tramps or hoboes, but the fact is that 80 per cent of them are useful citizens. Men walking on tracks to and from their places of work or business, children playing on tracks or flipping cars comprise the greater part of this shameful slaughter. To most people it seldom occurs that in walking on tracks they are taking any particular risk. It seems so easy to see or hear a train and when one thinks about the subject at all, he likely concludes that while others may have been caught he will be more vigilant and escape. Those injured and killed in this way are not the only ones who suffer. Their families being deprived of their earning power are called upon to bear a large share of the burden. The public is deprived of the service of this large army of persons and in a great percentage of cases are compelled to contribute to the care and maintenance of such persons and dependent members of their families. In view, therefore, of these facts and in the interest of public safety, every person is earnestly requested not to walk on or along railroad tracks both on account of his own safety and for the sake of setting a good example to others. We ask parents to call this subject to the attention of their children and instruct them as to the danger of walking or playing on or about tracks and of flipping cars. In this connection let us also call attention to another source of injury which is quite common, due to failure of persons to stop and look in both directions for approaching trains when about to cross tracks at highways and other places. Remember that trains may move on any track at any time. We do not believe that any person is so busy that he cannot take the few seconds before crossing a track to make sure that there is no approaching train. By all means never "duck under" crossing gates or across tracks when warned not to do so by signs from flagman or other source.

Hanover Boys wounded at Front.

SELKIRK WILSON

Son of Reece Wilson of Hanover, a brave young man of eighteen years who has been wounded at the front.

HERMAN MONTO

Son of Mr. John Monto of Hanover, who has been officially reported as wounded at the front.

LANCE CORPORAL JACK WILSON

Of Hanover, who is wounded and is now in an English Hospital.

Murder Still a Mystery

The Robert Bean murder at Goderich still remains a mystery and unless something unlooked for turns up it will never be solved. The detectives are still working on the case, pumping out all the wells in the neighborhood looking for the gun. Although an additional reward has been offered for the identity of the person who is supposed to have driven Dave Bean that night as yet the party has not been located.

66.000 Troops to England.

A memorandum issued by the Militia Department states that up to the present time nearly 55,000 officers and men have been despatched overseas by the Canadian Government. It is anticipated that by the first of July the number will reach approximately 66,000. More than [illegible] nurses have also gone forward. The recruiting enlistment and organization of additional forces is steadily proceeding and is the more necessary by reason of the very heavy casualties which have been sustained by the Canadian division during the past five weeks in the fighting near Langemarck and its vicinity. The gallantry, resourcefulness and tenacity of the Canadian troops during these battles, says the memorandum, "have never been surpassed."

Will Tour the Province.

After being in session three weeks, during which they chopped off a license here and a couple more there, issued a few warnings etc, the Ontario License Board is preparing for an eight-month jaunt over the province "to make the commissioners thoroughly conversant with prevailing conditions."

Northern League Formed.

The Northern Baseball league was duly launched on Friday of last week at a meeting held at Palmerston. The headquarters of the new league will be Owen Sound, the Secretary-treasurer being Mr. Joseph H. Ramsey who is manager of the local baseball team. The president is Mr. Wiseman of Palmerston, manager of the Sterling Bank branch of that place. About thirty teams are represented in the new league and it is hoped that it will get off to a good start though this is a bad year. The meeting was well attended despite the fact that many of the towns did not know just what it meant. Walkerton is in group No 2 with Hanover, Cargill, Teeswater and Mildmay, and it is to be expected that a number of good games will be staged before the end of the season. Not only will the district give some good games but the team that goes on into the finals is going to have plenty to do as with the seven districts which have been set out it is going to have plenty of competition. The teams composing the various groups are.

GROUP No 1
Wiarton, Chesley, Owen Sound.

GROUP No 2
Walkerton, Hanover, Teeswater, Cargill, Mildmay.

GROUP No 3
Palmerston, Harriston, Mount Forest.

GROUP No 4
Arthur, Bellwood, Kenilworth.

GROUP No 5
Lucknow, Wingham, Listowel, Kincardine, Ripley.

GROUP No 6
Goderich, Clinton, Teeswater, Mitchell.

GROUP No 7
Exeter, Crediton, Centralia, Ailsa Craig, Hensall.

The following league were represented: Saugeen League, Lakeside league and North Wellington league. President A. W. Buschlen of the Otter League, was also present and considerable credit in bringing the matter of organization to the present stage is due to him.

ACOUSTICS AND GHOSTS

The science of acoustics, according to Frank E. Morton, of Chicago, is one of the least developed and yet one of the most promising and fascinating subjects available. Mr Morton believes that anyone taking up the subject seriously will be rewarded with discoveries that will throw light on many hitherto unexplained phenomena, such as the appearance of ghosts, the hearing of sounds of unknown origin, and the manifestations of clairvoyance and clairaudience.

The first impress made on the mind by the study of acoustics, Mr Morton said, is the scope of the science. It is found almost in the beginning, he said, that, despite its name, the science is not limited to the study of sound. The student of the science cannot study sound alone. Sound, Mr. Morton asserted, is vibration and electricity, heat light and X-rays are vibrations of the same kind, only faster. The only difference, therefore, between sound, heat, light, electricity and X rays is the rapidity of vibration. A piano wire can be made to vibrate, Mr. Morton said, so as to produce each in order as desired.

"And these vibrations have been counted and classified," Mr. Morton said, "so that we can make a table of them. We have discovered that vibrations of from two a second to 32,768 a second are perceived by us as sound. They comprise the first fifteen octaves of our scale. But if we cause a wire to vibrate more than 32,768 times a second, sound ceases, and until the wire is vibrating more than 33,554,432 times a second, our senses perceive nothing from it. This is the first field of the unknown and the first promise of opportunity for discovery. What is produced by a wire vibrating between 32,768 and 33,554,432 times a second? We have ten octaves that are absolutely unknown.

"But the next octave, the 26th, is electricity, and we have electricity until the 35th octave is reached. The average vibration in these octaves is 1,073,741,824 times a second, and no matter how they are produced, electricity is the result. Then we enter another field of the unknown between the 35th and 45th octaves. After electricity ceases we perceive nothing until the wire is vibrating more than 35,184,372,088,832 times a second, and then we have light, which begins, of course, in heat. First, there are luminous rays, caloric and chemical, and then the progression from the infrared to the ultra-violet. With the ultraviolet rays, light disappears, and a third field of the unknown is entered. We stay in this field, in which our senses perceive nothing, until X-rays are found at the 58th octave, or at 288,230,376,151,711,744 vibrations a second. At the 62nd octave, or when 4,611,686,018,427,389,904 vibrations a second are attained, the X-rays disappear and we enter the last and limitless field of the unknown. No one has yet been able to perceive a result from vibrations in the 62nd octave and beyond.

"Thus we see," Mr. Morton went on, "how sound, electricity, light, X-rays, and unknown or unperceivable manifestations all have their place on one great scale. Now imagine some superman, some mighty being, sitting in the heavens before a universal keyboard on which he can strike octaves from the first to the 62nd. He strikes and we have sound, he strikes again and makes electricity, then light, then X-rays, then—what? We do not know. When we explore the fields of the unknown we will find out. We may learn to perceive that the superman will make in the unknown octaves with our ears or our eyes or with some sense that at present we do not know we possess."

Mr. Morton said that part of the work to be done in acoustics, in addition to discovering what certain vibrations made, was in placing manifestations of unknown rapidity of vibration in their proper places in the scale. This led him into the subject of ghosts, sounds of unknown origin, clairvoyance, and clairaudience.

"While it is true," he said, "that one encounters much fake and fiction when he studies these subjects, it is also true that there is much of fact in them. Ninety per cent of the ghosts seen, for example, 90 per cent, of the supernatural sounds heard, exist entirely in the imagination of the subjects, but the ten per cent remaining are actually seen or heard. They cannot be seen or heard by everyone, just as certain known sounds and sights cannot be perceived by all. Vibrations to be perceived must meet with a response, a receptivity, in the one who perceives. For example, most persons cannot perceive sound in the second octave, but others, whose ears are fitted or trained to it, can do so. What we call supernatural sounds or sights in the same way are perceived by some whose ears or eyes are properly responsive, while they cannot be perceived by others whose ears or eyes are not so responsive."

"There was an old stone house in France," Mr. Morton said. "In one room of which certain persons heard sounds of unknown origin, terrifying without being describable. That they were heard was established beyond doubt. Investigation located the sounds in one wall. That wall was torn down and found to be a double wall in which was discovered the skeleton of a woman. Ancient records revealed that the house had been a convent and that the woman long years before had been imprisoned alive in the double wall as punishment.

"The explanation of the sounds, while it is speculation and theory, is not discredited by any known scientific fact, and certain facts tend to support it. The theory is this: When the woman was slowly dying her mind became tremendously active in her agony. Her sufferings were registered in her brain and produced what we might call mind vibrations of great intensity. We know that this would happen in such a case.

"The woman's mind thus became a source of energy, and remained a source of energy after death. The vibrations continued even after the physical seat of them, the brain, had returned to dust. It is true scientifically that any source of energy continues such until some counteracting force stills it. Perpetual motion is impossible to us only because we are unable to eliminate resisting forces, such as friction. With a source of energy such as that credited by vibrations in the mind of the dying woman, it is argued, resisting forces are not present, and, if this is true, the vibrations would continue after the woman's life and brain had gone.

"These vibrations, then, continued, according to the theory, but because of their character or kind or intensity, their rapidity, the number per second, became fixed so that they were translated to those who perceive them as sound. In other words, they fell within the first fifteen octaves, where sound is known to be produced, or else in the unknown field between the fifteenth and 25th octaves, where we may find sound. The fact that some could hear the sounds while others could not may have been due either to the intensity of the vibrations or their rapidity.—New York Times.

FRENCH PRIEST LAUDS BRITONS

Glowing Tribute Paid to His Country's Ally

At Burial of Ten of Them Who Fell.

Acting Sergeant George Cowie, Lossiemouth, Scotland, at present in the Army Service Corps, in charge of a convoy for the front, says, in a recent letter from Northern France:

Being present during the speech by a French Catholic priest at the graveside of ten British soldiers at ——— I, through the kindness of a comrade-in-arms, who took a shorthand note, got a complete copy, which is as follows:

"Officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the British army, this morning two soldiers of the French army died at the hospital in consequence of their wounds. There was also one of those who made the wounds, whom we respect in death, as death is sacred. We brought them here under my feet, where I am standing. Now behold on this same day we accompany to our cemetery ten other victims. These are English, our faithful allies. For us Frenchmen in this terrible conflict the issue at stake is our very existence as a nation. According to the words of the greatest of their poets, their Shakespeare, for us it is 'to be or not to be.' But for them, the English, it is not the same. We are defending our soil, our houses, our wives, our churches, our children, all we hold dear and sacred to us. For them they have no need to leave their sweet home, their green Ireland, their glorious Scotland, their grand and ancient England. They might have remained by aid of their wives and children; they might have continued their farming, their commerce, their industry; they might have graced the seas with their ships—superb and peaceful. Why have they left everything, given up everything, sacrificed everything. Why do they descend upon our shore every day like a wave which nothing can stop? Why are they here at our side, arm [illegible] calm, intrepid, happy, and smiling? Because they are men of honor. Honor was violated; the liberty of the people on the continent was in danger. Treaties with their signatures attached were torn up, and they [illegible] and said 'No.' Their old [illegible] revived and made their hearts [illegible] with indignation—'My God and my [illegible]' that is translated in every tongue by the other word—'My Duty.' When we do our duty we can claim to be in the right. They are right. They sacrifice themselves for it. They fall for it. They are lying here for the cause of it. Your minister of the High Protestant Church in your national tongue, the Catholic priest in your old Latin liturgy—each respecting the liberty of each other's conscience—have said prayers over their bodies which console and comfort, that your God, which is our God, may hearken unto them. May the God of Honor and Right watch over their bodies. May He take care of their souls. May He give them what they deserve—having done their duty and their right—eternal rest; because you, like us, believe in the immortality of the soul. Lieutenant Gillet, Privates Stanley, Macdonald, Smith, Grath, and your three brought from the Hotel du Nord—English, Scottish, Irish—sleep in peace in the cemetery of ———. The Government of the Republic, represented by the Sub-Prefect, and all the functionaries thank you. The people of the town have strewn flowers on your coffins. You have defended and perhaps saved our country from the worst plague—from the invasion which threatened our doors. Blessing upon you. Your memory will live among us. We will take care of your graves. Farewell."

Writing to his relatives at Lossiemouth with reference to the foregoing, Sergeant Cowie adds: "Is it not beautiful and so very touching?" While standing listening to a speech over the departed, tears came to my eyes, and were honestly shed bareheaded, 'midst a drenching shower of snow, and the thunder of the artillery almost deafening the pious priest's eulogy. You can imagine the touching nature of the scene."

HORSE TRICKS.

They Are Liable to be Played at an Awkward Moment.

It is not always wise to teach a horse to play tricks, as this story told by General Sir Robert Baden-Powell in Pearson's Magazine proves:

John Leech's inimitable circus horse that insisted on sitting down with his rider whenever he heard a band play, is the prototype of a horse of mine which, in a weak moment, I had taught to rear up and "salaam" whenever I leaned forward to make a bow.

It was all very pretty when I was out riding and met any lady of my acquaintance, but it became an infernal nuisance when I was out pig sticking. I would lean forward to meet the rush of a charging boar with my spear up would go the silly beast on end, just at the moment when his safety depended on my taking a true and deadly aim with my spear point. The consequence was that his hind legs showed many scars from the boar's tusks, and he was lucky that he did not end his career with his belly ripped open.

I had, too, at one time a fine, but somewhat nervous, charger. One day on a parade my mount suddenly gave way with me and quietly lay down. I thought for the moment he was ill, but on rousing him he immediately sprang to his feet, quite fit and well. A week or two later, when riding with a friend, we stopped for a moment to admire the view, when down he went again. It was evident to me that he had been trained to lie down at a given signal, but I never could discover for the life of me what that signal was.

Boots That Stood the Test

Ames Holden McCready Limited, Canada's largest shoe manufacturers, supplied, within thirty-[illegible] days, [illegible] pairs of leather ankle boots, and [illegible] pairs of canvas shoes for the outfitting of the First Canadian Contingent, the largest quantity supplied by any manufacturer.

These boots were worn by our soldiers on active service both in this country and in the training camps in England. They were subjected to the most severe usage that boots could be subjected to. They travelled over rough roads and [illegible]. They [illegible] through mud and through slush [illegible]. They were soaked by the [illegible] rains of an abnormally wet English winter. They were baked on hot stoves, [illegible] on radiators and roasted before [illegible] fires. Yes, THEY STOOD THE TEST.

Out of the entire 32,217 pairs of leather boots supplied by this company only a single pair was shown to be open to [illegible] the Government enquiry [illegible] made [illegible] later.

Experts employed by the Government examined 1265 pairs and 315 odd boots made by various manufacturers. Among the samples were found only seven pairs of boots of Ames Holden McCready manufacture, of which five were found to be repairable [illegible] and ONE PAIR HAD A [illegible] UNDER GAUGE.

The best proof of the durability and serviceability of the Ames Holden McCready boots, however, was afforded by the sworn statements of soldiers who had worn their boots constantly from the time they were issued in September, 1914, right through to March, 1915. They swore that they had worn the boots through all the rough experiences at Valcartier and on Salisbury Plain and that they had given excellent service. [illegible] Sergeant [illegible], of Toronto, who had served twelve years in the British Army, appeared before the Committee with a pair of such boots still on his feet and submitted them to the committee's inspection.

The testimony of these witnesses has since been amply corroborated by numerous reports and letters received from officers and soldiers at the front all testifying to the good wearing qualities of the Ames Holden McCready boots.

* * *

When the question was raised concerning the quality of the Canadian soldiers' boots, Ames Holden McCready, Limited placed themselves IMMEDIATELY upon record, by writing to the Government as desirous of having the most thorough investigation of the matter. The appointment of a Parliamentary Committee and the judicial enquiry followed. It occupied several weeks' time. The Committee stopped at nothing in their efforts to get at all the facts.

This Company purchased the best leather and supplies available in Canada and spared no expense in manufacturing the boots. All our [illegible] and shop [illegible] records were produced before the Parliamentary Committee for their inspection and information. We had nothing to hide and were proud of the boots which were furnished to the Government.

THE AMES HOLDEN McCREADY BOOTS CAME OUT OF THE ORDEAL UNSCATHED.

The Committee reported to Parliament that the boots supplied by this company substantially complied with the sample, that no paper or other [illegible] substances had been employed in their manufacture and that all charges impugning the integrity of this company or of the boots supplied by them had been abundantly disproved by the sworn evidence taken before the Committee.

The report, which was adopted by Parliament, was A COMPLETE VINDICATION FOR AMES HOLDEN McCREADY LIMITED.

* * *

In bringing these facts prominently before the people of the Dominion, Ames Holden McCready Limited are actuated by the desire not only to protect their own good name—which needs no vindication with the thousands of Canadians who are familiar with this company and its products—but also that of a notable and important Canadian industry, which has been unwarrantably aspersed.

Canada's Part In Feeding the Warring Nations

When ten, fifteen or twenty million men go to war, and become destroyers instead of producers, a food problem promptly looms up before the nations involved. It is not because people eat more in war time, but because they produce less, or the means of transportation is denied, that food products go to famine prices. The outbreak of war last year came too late to effect very seriously European production, except in comparatively small areas where the crops were not harvested; but the market, in anticipation of a wheat shortage, has gone to a price higher than the average yearly price for any period in the last [illegible] years.

It is a notable fact that wars are more productive of record wheat prices than is famine. Records of wheat prices in England, going back as far as 1610, show that the highest prices prevailed during the war periods. This was most noticeable during the period of the Napoleonic wars (1793-1815). In 1812 the average price of wheat in England was $6.85 a bushel, which is the highest recorded in British history, and for fifteen years the average annual price never fell below $1.76. In order to appreciate what these prices meant, it must also be remembered that the average earning power of the individual a hundred years ago was only a fraction of what it is to-day.

At the outbreak of the present war wheat prices immediately bounded upward, although, of course, there was just as much (or rather more on account of American and Canadian harvests) wheat available on September 1st as August 1st. There was no immediate wheat shortage, but the world assumed that, with several great nations at war, production would be lessened and a shortage would follow. Consequently the price of wheat on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, which has averaged 85 7-8 cents for the twelve months preceding the outbreak of the war, sprang up to $1.11 for the next four months, and has since been over the dollar-and-a-half mark for a considerable period.

The nations now engaged in war are among the great wheat producing countries of the world, as is shown by the following statistics giving their production of wheat for the year 1913:

Germany	171,077,000 bushels
Austria	59,636,000 bushels
Belgium	15,042,000 bushels
France	322,731,000 bushels
Great Britain and Ireland	56,691,000 bushels
Hungary	166,675,000 bushels
Russia	975,790,000 bushels

The production of the British colonies is not included in the above statement, as it will not be reduced by the war, and the grain crop of Japan is omitted for the same reason. Servia's crop is comparatively small, and is not included. Figures from Turkey are not procurable.

The falling off in production in these countries on account of the war can only be estimated, but if it should be placed at the moderate average of 25 per cent, it will result in a wheat shortage for 1915 of over four hundred million bushels.

Throughout all Canada a great effort is being made to supply this shortage. Canada could by herself supply the entire shortage if enough labor and equipment could be brought to bear, but this is manifestly impossible. According to a Dominion Government report there are 220,172,197 acres of arable agricultural lands in Canada not yet occupied, and of the land occupied there are still 77,177,057 acres which have not been brought under cultivation. If this enormous area were under crop the world would face a supply instead of a shortage.

But although it is not impossible in a single season to bring all the fertile land in Canada under cultivation wonderful things are accomplished. Estimates of the increased wheat area in the three great wheat producing Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta vary from 15 to 40 per cent. No doubt 20 per cent would be accepted as a conservative general estimate. The area under wheat in these three Provinces last year was 9,335,400 acres, an increase of 20 per cent, will mean an additional 1,867,080 acres under wheat in 1915. Wheat crops in these provinces for the last ten years have given an average yield of nineteen bushels per acre. The average consumption of wheat per head is said to be 6 1-4 bushels, so that Western Canada's extra production this year on the above basis will feed 5,677,000 people. The entire wheat crop of Western Canada will be sufficient to feed a population of approximately thirty-four millions.

To estimate, at this season of the year, the money value of this crop is dangerously akin to counting chickens still in the incubator, but all signs point to prosperity on the farm unequalled in the history of the west. Not only will the farmer have more wheat to sell, but he is gradually bringing every branch of agriculture on to a sounder basis, particularly by diversifying his interest and giving more and more attention to stock-raising and dairying. His prosperity will be reflected in every line of legitimate trade. The rush to purchase farm lands in Western Canada in the last months is proof, not of returning confidence—for confidence in fertile farm lands was never shaken—but of a new wave of enterprise and energy that will bear the country on to a state of development beyond any of its past attainments.

GERMAN PEOPLE SICK OF THE WAR

Realize That Their Situation Will Daily Grow Worse.

Poorer Classes Already Are in Awful Plight.

According to the Berne (Switzerland) papers of April 21st, a Swiss who had then just returned from Germany, where he had been spending some time in the country districts, remarked on the untrustworthiness of information gained from German newspapers and German private letters, all of which pass through so strict a censorship that anything really calculated to throw light on the state of the country is invariably eliminated. According to one account of this gentleman's statement wired to London, a correct idea of the situation in Germany cannot be formed from visits to Berlin and the other large German cities. It is pointed out that it is almost always of Berlin that the Germans speak, and always Berlin that they like to show to any neutral visitor. The Swiss, whose business took him to small towns and the country districts, remarks that in his opinion it is utterly misleading to speak now of the mass of the German people being enthusiastic for the war. All the working classes, all those with relatives at the front, the farmers, business men, and most of the highly-educated classes, speak of the war as of a sad misfortune, which they hope will end as speedily as possible. Even invalid soldiers of whom great numbers are now to be seen home from the front on account of sickness, and the Landsturm men guarding powder stores, railways, and bridges, all adopt the same tone. "The German people is becoming more and more convinced that Germany has nothing more to gain from the war, and that her situation is becoming daily worse, while it is more and more frequently complained that the people are kept in the dark as to the true state of affairs, and even that they are being directly lied to and deceived. Mistrust of the Government is increasing, and the present reign of terror makes it worse still.

This applies more especially to the poorer classes of the population—those who travel fourth class, who are crowded together in the cramped dwellings, and who are now being underpaid and underfed owing to the lowness of wages and the high prices of necessaries. The bread rations are much too small, at any rate for this class of people and for those with large families. The poorer people cannot afford meat, and often cannot procure potatoes either, and frequently have consumed their allotted portion of bread in two-thirds of the time allowed for its consumption. Consequently for days a poor family has often no bread. It is true that there is plenty of meat in Germany, especially owing to the immense number of pigs which have been compulsorily slaughtered of late for want of sufficient fodder. In many industries not only have wages been reduced, but also hours of work. The "great German patriots" have not failed to exploit the present situation. For instance, a large Stuttgart textile firm, which has been fully occupied working for the Army and Navy all the winter and must have cleared quite £25,000 profits, has been paying its women workers 5 marks weekly. Apparently only the skilled workmen can now command good wages, and owing to the scarcity of such men they can always insist on being well paid; but as for the women, who frequently replace their men folk who are in the army, they are paid starvation wages, and thus the rate of wages in general is being lowered in Germany.

How Epigrams Are Made.

The local representative of the great wit and humor factory bent over his work bench and eyed his last [illegible] epigram that had been worked until it was [illegible].

"It's a shame to throw it away," he said, "but I believe it can still be [illegible] so that it will have a commercial value. I know what I will do; I will offer a prize to the workman who brings in the best new twist."

So when the workmen were gathered in the room he told them that he wanted them to bring out a new and clever turn upon the old maxim: "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." He [illegible] with a monetary prize for the best effort and honorable mention for the others. And [illegible] for all.

When the time was up the assortment was handed in.

"A chauffeur in the front seat is worth two under the motor car."

"A kiss in the dark is worth two under the electric light."

"A grain of sand on the beach is worth two in the eye."

"A gift from a husband after marriage is worth two from a lover before."

"A [illegible] is worth two [illegible]."

"A [illegible] is worth two [illegible] at night."

And while the first five received honorable mention, it was the last one that won the prize.

Water on the brain is never the result of a thirst for knowledge.

ACNE.

Acne is a very common skin disease, which causes a good deal of needless worry in young people of both sexes. Pimples come out in great numbers on the face and between the shoulders. They do not effect much harm in either place, but in the former considerably spoil personal beauty for the time being. But no young person need ever trouble much about them, for they will surely pass away in the end without any treatment whatever.

Sometimes you have only the familiar blackhead, most plentiful on and about the nose. The proper treatment is to squeeze out each thoroughly, sitting before a looking-glass. When you wash your face always rub vigorously with a rough towel.

Then you are apt to get in addition to this red and unsightly pimples, some of which form matter. For these take plenty of rhubarb, vegetables and fruit, and avoid salted meats or fish. Attend to the general health, and above all things see that you pay the regular early call that nature requires.

Of course, matter should be squeezed out wherever it has formed. It is well to bathe the face regularly in hot water with a handful of oatmeal in it for ten minutes night and morning, and rub dry with a rough towel. Otherwise, local applications, such as lotions or ointments, are of little service.

CORNS.

Are the source of no end of human suffering. To our poor fellows in the war there can be no greater cause of actual disablement or illness.

As everyone knows they proceed from intermitting pressure on the natural padding of the skin at one particular spot. Hence it is always important, by way of preventive, to secure well-fitting boots which do not squeeze.

Hard corns can be cured by the repeated application of strong nitric acid with a bit of wood—say, the free end of a match. But you have to keep on doing this a long while, cutting off the dead skin, and reapplying the caustic to the part underneath, before you really extirpate the roots. Meanwhile you go through much pain and are lame. So as a rule it is seldom worth while to undertake this process. You can always keep the hard corn under control by cutting it, being careful each time to get below the white layer which shows itself at the core.

Soft corns, on the other hand, while often intensely painful, very easily yield to a perfectly painless method of cure. All you have to do is to procure some powdered chalk and rub a little in every night before getting into bed, with a bit of cotton wool.

BUNIONS.

These are produced by undue pressure on the natural cushion, called a bursa, over the joint of the great toe. The boots are always greatly at fault.

If there is nothing beyond the bursa, all you have to do is to get easy boots, and paint the place for a few nights with tincture of iodine.

But the tendency of a bunion is to become coated with hard corn, in which corns develop. Then there is much pain. Keep the corns well cut down, as above indicated.

Some people have the great toe bent inwards, often quite crumpled up under the other toes. The greatest care should be taken about children's boots in early life, for it is usually due to this source that the distortion arises. Of course these unlucky people suffer the most from bunions in after life, and gouty attacks specially develop in the same joint.

SPRAINS

A bad sprain is a very chronic and awkward thing to deal with; nearly as bad as a broken bone, very often—occasionally a great deal worse.

It generally means that you have ruptured more or less thoroughly some of the important ligaments which hold the joint together. It is by any calculation, you should understand that with a little more violence the joint would have been entirely dislocated. Then, also, blood vessels have almost certainly been ruptured, with resultant effusion of blood into the tissues, perhaps into the joint itself. Hence the severe pain on movement, the local swelling, and all the other symptoms.

Rest is the one thing needed in the first instance. If you have badly sprained your ankle lie in bed or on the sofa; night and morning dip it for ten minutes in water as hot as can be borne; in the interval wear a bandage applied so as to be comfortably tight. If it is your wrist that is hurt, apply the hot water in the same manner, and keep your arm in a sling. Later, when it is necessary to overcome the remaining stiffness, get someone to rub the wrist with one part of turpentine to five parts of olive oil, previously warmed.

THE TREATMENT OF CUTS AND BRUISES.

Two points are of paramount importance in the treatment of all incised wounds. The first is cleanliness, the second dryness.

By cleanliness, I do not mean indiscriminate douching with water, but quite the reverse. If you happen to cut your finger you will notice that after the immediate smart, the little wound is perfectly dry, to which end a good dusting it into water. Then it begins to ache immediately, which is a fairly sure indication that something is wrong. We will take it that the cut has been made by a fairly clean knife. Then all you want is to seal it up as promptly as possible from all outside agencies by sticking plaster or the like. But don't put it into water if you can possibly help it until this has been done.

Then for larger wounds, which have to be sewn up, unless there be reason to suppose that earth or dust, or foul matter has already got in, it is best not to wash before the sutures. The healing will be far safer and quicker if no water has been allowed to touch the wound at any time. But on the other hand, should there be defilement, the greatest care must be taken to cleanse from this, and the wound thoroughly washed out with warm (not cold) water, containing a teaspoonful of tincture of iodine to the half-pint.

In the case the soldiers, I understand, are instructed to carry with them a small bottle of tincture of iodine, and directly they are wounded to paint out the lesion with that. This hurts, but it is a valuable precaution to prevent no tetanus and all the other dangers which lurk around.

FURTHER TREATMENT.

When an incised wound has been sewn up, and is expected to heal by what is called "first intention," it matters little what application you put over it—aseptic wool, aseptic gauze, carbolic gauze or the like—so long as you keep the surface perfectly dry, to which end a good dusting with powdered borax or any similar absorbent powder is advisable. If the wound has been large enough to require a drainage-tube, it must be well squeezed when this is removed, and subsequently, perhaps for a day or two. No moisture should be permitted either on the skin or under it.

Should the wound involve a suppurating cavity, it is infinitely preferable to squeeze thoroughly and often—than to syringe with water in any shape, however disguised as a nominally antiseptic lotion.

Bruises of any extent require patience, and the free application of hot fomentations until all the extravasated blood and blood-serum have been reabsorbed. Hot water is a far more efficient styptic astringent, preventive of hemorrhage than cold. Hence early applications of hot water to the unbroken skin as to the raw surface of a wound go far to check the subcutaneous bleeding from ruptured vessels. At a later stage cooling lotions which evaporate are useful, such as methylated spirit freely diluted with water.

SPECIAL CAUSE OF INDIGESTION.

With women, excessive indulgence in tea is an often-unnoticed cause. As a rule, and especially for young people, tea should not be taken more than once a day, and then for breakfast.

With men, the same applies to alcohol. Here again, the over-frequency is the prime mover—it is the constant tippling that is most pernicious. A man who gets drunk once a week seriously harms himself more and more materially shortens his life than he who never gets intoxicated at all, but is always tippling. As a general rule, people are better without alcoholic drinks in middle life, except under conditions of extreme fatigue.

REMEDIES.

The great thing is to prevent indigestion by not breaking natural law, or if you do this unavoidably and unconsciously, you have to set yourself at once to seek out what you do that is wrong, and endeavor to avoid it.

Often constipation is the cause; and you have to avoid this in ways that readily suggest themselves. You may have to take physic, but fruit and exercise are better.

For an undigested meal, pepsine is the appropriate remedy. It establishes artificial digestion—"helps the lame dog over the stile."

When there is pain in the stomach, take 10 grains of bismuth in water an hour before the meals, and also 15 grains of bicarbonate of soda in a bitter infusion, as made up by the chemist.

The Slow, Sluggish, Torpid Action of the Liver is Responsible for Many Ills.

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills stimulate the sluggish liver, clean the coated tongue, sweeten the obnoxious breath, clean away all waste and poisonous matter from the system, and prevent as well as cure all complaints arising from a liver which has become inactive.

Constipation, sick headache, bilious headache, jaundice, heartburn, water brash, catarrh of the stomach, etc., all come from a disordered liver.

Mr. Victor B. McNeills, Sandstone, Alta., writes: "I thought I would write and tell you of my experience with Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, as I am greatly pleased with the results I received by using them. I was troubled with sick headache for a long time, and would get so sleepy right after I ate my dinner that I could not do any work. A friend of mine, from Toronto, visited me last summer and he asked me to try Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills. He told me they had done him so much good for his stomach. I used several vials, and I found they did me so much good that I can recommend them to any one suffering from liver trouble."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c a vial, 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

YOU SHOULD BE AFRAID OF A COUGH OR COLD.

Coughs and colds do not call for a minute recital of symptoms, as they are well known to everyone, but their dangers are not so well known. All the most severe affections of the throat, the lungs and the bronchial tubes are, in the beginning, but coughs and colds.

Many people when they contract a slight cold do not pay any attention to it, thinking perhaps that it will pass away in a day or two. The upshot is that before they know it, it has settled on their lungs.

Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that on the first sign of a cough or cold it must be gotten rid of immediately, as failure to do this may cause years of suffering from serious lung trouble.

DR. WOOD'S
NORWAY PINE SYRUP

will cure the cough or cold and prove a preventive from all throat and lung troubles such as bronchitis, pneumonia and consumption.

Mr. B. E. Drace, Brighton, Ont., writes: "I am sending you my testimony of what Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup did for my little girl. The doctor had given her up as she was, as we thought, going into a decline with the cough she had. I was told by a lady friend to try 'Dr. Wood's,' and when she had taken two bottles she was on her feet again, and four bottles cured her."

Dr. Wood's Norway Pine Syrup is the best cure for coughs and colds. It is put up in a yellow wrapper; three pine trees the trade mark; the price, 25c and 50c, manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

BROODER PROBLEMS.

With the increasing interest shown in day-old chicks by beginners, the brooder problem becomes more of a study each year.

Many different makes of brooders are on the market, from the small hover to the larger coal, gas and oil-burning brooders with a capacity of from 500 to 1,000 chicks. The average beginner, however, must, as a rule, resort to the hover, due to starting with a small number of chicks, or several brooders with a rated capacity of from 50 to 60 chicks.

The main essential when chicks are received and placed under the hover is to have and maintain, especially for the first ten days to two weeks, a uniform temperature at the start of from 90 to 95 degrees, gradually lowering this as the chicks grow older and stronger, taking always the weather conditions into consideration. In cold weather the chicks need and thrive on more heat than later in the spring, when it is warmer. The beginner should bear in mind that a high brooder temperature is better than a low temperature.

While it is not good for the chicks to be compelled to stay in a temperature from 100 to 110, less harm will result than if the heat went down to 70 or 80 degrees, for under these conditions for any length of time it means chilled chicks, and if the results are not fatal they at least result in a check in growth, which is seldom, if ever recovered. In a measure, chicks confined to a high temperature can get away from it by crowding to the edge of the hover. This applies only to the small hovers, for in the larger hovers each chick can seek its own heat, and at the same time ample ventilation. In operating this kind of brooder plenty of heat is essential, although the thing to guard against is to see that plenty of ventilation is obtained, as the greater heat of these large brooders not only gives a temperature of 110 to 70 degrees from under the hover to the outer edge, but also warms the room or colony house in which the brooder is placed, and fresh air is essential.

In the case of day-old chicks, the beginner will seldom feed too soon, an error indulged in by so many who start raising poultry, as from the time of leaving the incubator at the hatchery until they are delivered and placed under the brooder 48 to 50 and sometimes more hours have passed. It is this that has led many beginners to claim better results from the purchased day-old chicks than from the chicks hatched from eggs purchased and incubated by them.

There is little economy in the purchase of cheap chick feeds. At the start the chicks eat but little, and should, for best results, have the best in a chick feed. The first feed can be of rolled oats, followed by a good clean chick feed, with not over 20 or 30 per cent. of corn. Grit and charcoal should be before them at all times. Dry bran can be fed in hoppers beginning the third day, and a regular dry mash, composed of bran, middlings, ground alfalfa, ground oats and 15 per cent. of beef scraps can be started at the tenth day. Where milk in any form can be obtained, it is a valuable addition to the regular ration.

Especially during the first 10 days to two weeks, avoid crowding. This applies to the use of the small brooder with a rated capacity of from 50 to 60 chicks. For the first few days overcrowded brooder chicks may do well, but as they rapidly grow larger they do not obtain the proper ventilation and under the crowded conditions do not thrive. The beginner is wise if two brooders are purchased, placing never more than 50 chicks under the hover.

Success can always be obtained if the essentials are followed well. A proper room for a given number of chicks, an even brooder temperature, especially during the first 10 days, a good clean chick feed, grit, charcoal and fresh water, with milk if possible once a day. Green food can never be neglected. Sprouted oats, cut cabbage or lawn cuttings, green clover, all will well repay the poultry keeper if fed in good quantities.

NOTES.

Poultry associations are of great benefit to the poultry raisers in their zone. The exchange of ideas at the regular meetings, co-operation in buying of feeds, poultry equipment and the selling of eggs and poultry should be worked out in one way or the other. Lectures should be engaged from time to time, and any live association is well worth the price of membership many times over. Poultry associations that hold forth no inducement but a poultry show once a year can seldom keep up a good, large and live membership. The aim of any association should be to benefit all classes of poultry raisers.

Is there an egg type? There may be one discovered in the future, but as long as photographs, winners at the leading shows, with not only private records, but official laying contest and State experiment station records, show ten different types all with high egg records, the fact that any one type is it will be hard to swallow by the average poultry keeper.

The average beginner seldom realizes the importance of natural shade for poultry. They can and in many cases do well without it, but added profit can be assured where conditions are as near ideal for poultry comforts as possible. In the long run the shaded runs for poultry, the natural grass for the young chicks to grow upon, are big factors for complete success. They cannot always be had, and artificial shade resorted to and the feeding of green feed in the form of sprouted oats, cabbage, beets, etc., is a good substitute.

Keep the flock up by retaining only those fowls that have standard shape, good egg-producers during the winter months, one who have never been sick at any time. By keeping fowls of this class one will soon have a flock worth while. They cost no more than the scrub hen to maintain.

MOTHERS' CONFERENCE ON.

(St. Thomas Journal)

When the fighting has been finished and the world settling down once more to the ordinary routine of life, would it not be an excellent idea to call a world convention of mothers to discuss militarism. If all the mothers could get together and agree on a plan to keep all thoughts of militarism out of the minds of their children and the children to come, there would be, in a few generations more, no more war. This seems to be the most logical path toward the far-off goal of universal peace.

THE "MADE-IN-CANADA" SAFETY STEERING DEVICE

W. L. McCracken, of Winnipeg, patentee of the "Made-in-Canada" safety steering device for Ford cars, will occupy a very leading place with the legions of Ford car owners all over Canada. His device places the Ford car on a par with all other cars as far as the steering is concerned. The McCracken device does away with the nerve racking necessity of having to grip the wheel firmly. This has, in a large measure, taken away the pleasures of motoring in a Ford car. With the device attached to a car, the driver can sit back comfortably and enjoy to the full pleasures of country driving. The device is very simple, and can be easily and quickly attached, and weighs but five pounds. It is well and strongly built, and is thoroughly guaranteed. The Ford car has always been a popular car, and the "made-in-Canada" device has added immeasurably to the value of this car.

Tests made in Winnipeg, under almost impossible conditions, proved beyond any doubt that the McCracken device is one of the great boons of the age. The demand for the device in Western Canada has been enormous, and is growing constantly. Eastern Canada is now being taken up, and Ford owners should investigate for themselves the splendid worth of this device.

This is the only steering device made in Canada, and this in itself is a big incentive for Canadians to get hold of an invention purely Canadian.

ALLIGATORS OF PANAMA.

One Man Eater That Had Terrorized Two Neighboring Villages

With other white companions I have often plunged into the waters of the Tuyra, a fairly large river which flows into the gulf of Panama after having traversed immense stretches of impenetrable forests. Regularly a score or so of alligators assisted at our gambols at a distance of thirty or forty yards, and we came to look upon them as quite harmless.

After an absence of two years I returned and in two neighboring villages found the inhabitants terrified. No one dared to go near the river at night-fall. No one ventured, even in broad daylight, to cross the stream in the narrow canoes which are used by the natives to carry bananas and vegetables from their plantations.

The cause of this terror, I discovered, was an alligator that had devoured thirty persons in less than two months, surprising some on the river bank and literally snapping others out of their canoes. Thirty people, and the two villages together only numbered 250 souls!

After a series of fruitless attempts we ended in capturing the brute with a baited hook, an enormous affair, to which we fastened half a pig. The creature was close on twenty-four feet long. He was so old that seaweed and mosses were growing between his scales, and he presented the appearance of a tree trunk that had been a long time submerged. He was, we estimated, more than 100 years old.—Paul Drevy in Wide World Magazine.

THIS SCHOOL GIRL HAD BAD FAINTING SPELLS

Was Weak and Run Down, But Dr. Chase's Nerve Food Made Complete Cure.

The most critical time in a girl's life comes during the school age, when she is impelled by rivalry to put forth her best efforts in studying for examinations. At the time she should have healthful outdoor exercise and abundance of fresh air, to keep the blood pure and rich, she is confined to her studies. Is it any wonder that she becomes run down in health and suffers from headaches, indigestion, loss of appetite and spells of weakness or fainting?

The case described in this letter is a good illustration, and you can read here the splendid results of using Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, to help through this critical period.

Mrs. H. Houston, Highland Grove, Ont., writes:

"While attending school my daughter became weak and very much run down. She was subsequently troubled with bad fainting spells, and nothing we tried seemed to do her any good. We were advised to try Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, and did so with most satisfactory results. I am pleased to tell you that after using five boxes of the Nerve Food she was completely cured and has no return of the fainting spells."

This statement is certified to by Mr. Hamilton Houston, Justice of the Peace.

The reason Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is so effective in cases of this kind is because of its extraordinary blood-forming influence. By creating an abundance of rich, red blood it strengthens the action of the heart, revitalizes the exhausted nerves and builds up the system in every way.

The appetite is restored, digestion improves, sleep is restful and refreshing, and the new vigor and energy is felt in every organ of the human body. Dr. Chase's Nerve Food is doing wonders for men, women and children, whose systems have become weak and run down. Fifty cents a box, 6 for $2.50, all dealers, or Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

A COMPLETE WRECK

From the After Effects of Pneumonia Followed by Diphtheria.

Frequently the after effects of illness are more serious than the original trouble. This was the case with Mrs. James H. Moir, Mutana, Sask. Mrs. Moir says: "Some years ago, while we were still living in Nova Scotia, I was taken down with a severe attack of pneumonia. I had sufficiently recovered to be around, but had not been able to go out when I was attacked with diphtheria. In my weakened state it took a terrible hold on me, and neither my friends nor neighbors thought I would recover. I did, however, pull through, but was a physical wreck. The muscles of my throat were paralyzed, so that even a sup of water would flow back through my nostrils unless they were held closed. My voice was almost inaudible, and my eyes so badly affected that I feared I was going to lose my eyesight. I could only walk with assistance, and it looked as though I would be a helpless cripple. Medicine after medicine was used, but did not help me. Then a neighbor advised Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I began taking them, but had the utmost difficulty in swallowing them owing to the condition of my throat. However, after a couple of boxes had been used I found it easier to take them, which was a sign they were helping me, and I felt greatly cheered. I do not know how many boxes I took, but I continued their use until I was as well as ever, much to the surprise of all who knew me, as all thought I could not get better. Since then I have several times taken the Pills when run down and have always been greatly benefited by them."

For the after effects of fevers and all wasting diseases there is no medicine can equal Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They enrich the blood, build up the nerves, restore the appetite and bring back complete health and strength. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

NATURE'S POWERS.

She Yields Them in Many Ways for Use of Man.

In several ingenious ways the forces of nature are now exploited in order to provide power for machinery necessary for various human activities. Such apparatus is especially favored by engineers, for not only can enormous power be obtained, but the running expenses are extremely low. One of the most ingenious of these inventions is that which obtains power from the rays of the sun. The apparatus is at work in Egypt, where it pumps up water onto high levels in thousands of gallons.

This novel device consists of a number of reflecting mirrors which concentrate the rays of the sun onto a glass covered trough containing water. In a short space of time this water becomes sufficiently heated by the reflection from the mirrors to give off steam, which passes into a pipe to an engine of the usual steam variety. When some thirty or forty of these heating boxes are boiling water by means of the sun's heat sufficient steam is obtained to keep a powerful pumping engine at work with a minimum of expense.

Some idea of the enormous power which the sun machine conveys to the engine can be gauged by the fact that 3,000 gallons of water can be lifted forty feet in one minute. In many ingenious ways water is now trapped by means of dams, gigantic reservoirs and great stretches of piping and converted into power for various purposes.

Many great waterfalls are now harnessed in such a fashion, two of the most important being the falls of the Rhine and those of Niagara. The machinery used to obtain power from these great products of nature is somewhat complicated, but roughly speaking huge pipes divert tons of water from the rapids just above the fall. This trapped water is then allowed to fall some hundreds of feet and the force of its fall produces enormous power. The falls of Niagara are made to produce little short of 1,000,000 horse-power.

Still more ingenious is another method of producing power from sea water by the rise and fall of the tides. Portions of the coast where high tides are the rule are chosen and a number of clefts in the cliffs are constructed or those of nature especially adapted. The water runs far into the openings at high tide and by means of pipes is trapped into a huge reservoir. When the tide falls hundreds of gallons of water are thus left behind. Being on a high level it is then a comparatively simple matter to drop this water by means of pipes to a level many feet below and utilize the power thus obtained by the usual water jets acting on specially constructed wheels.

Wind is still trapped and converted into power by windmills, but these machines are very different from the old type of mill with its four big sails. The modern windmill is a scientifically constructed apparatus, the driving force consisting of a wheel containing a number of steel blades placed at such an angle that they respond to every puff of wind. So delicate is the construction of these instruments that even a moderate breeze will whirl the large wheel around at many hundred revolutions a minute. This motion acts as a shaft which provides power for electric dynamos below. These machines are used mostly in coast towns or those situated on high levels, where wind blows more or less constantly.

One of the most ingenious projects for harnessing the forces of nature is that conceived by Sir William Ramsay, and despite its daring nature it has been well received in high scientific circles. His plan is to take the heat of the earth's interior by means of huge bore holes. These shafts would be sunk deep into the earth, so that they penetrated into large coal seams. By means of electricity this coal would be fired until it burned like some powerful internal furnace. By means of pipes the gas given off by this burning coal would be conveyed to the surface and in various ways utilized for power purposes. The advantage of this scheme is that power could be derived from coal as it lay in its natural element, and the cost of mining it and bringing it up would be avoided.

Carbonate of soda will remove the most obstinate of mud stains. Rub off with a cloth or flannel dipped in the soda, then press well on the wrong side of the material with a warm iron.

To clean a vinegar cruet put a teaspoonful of lye in it and then fill it with water. Let it remain in it for a few days, and then rinse the cruet out thoroughly. It will be perfectly clean.

Putting a coat of varnish on the linoleum yearly will make it last for years and look bright and new.

To remove a fresh ink stain, saturate it with kerosene oil and let it remain for 10 minutes, then wash out.

Liquid bluing, which never settles, is made by dissolving one ounce of Prussian blue and one-half ounce of oxalic acid in a quart of cold water. Be careful of the acid—it is deadly poison.

To remove black grease rub patiently with ether. It will not leave a ring, like gasoline, and will remove every trace of the stain.

A silver spoon in a glass will temper it so that hot liquids may be turned in without danger of breaking the glass.

When boiling clothes place an unpeeled lemon cut in slices in the boiler with the clothes to boil. This will remove the stains and make the clothes beautifully white.

A good way to cook green peas is to add a lettuce leaf and a teaspoonful of sugar when putting on to boil. They will retain their color and have a much better flavor.

If a cake sticks to the pan, turn the pan upside down and lay on the bottom of it a cloth wet with cold water. After about five minutes the cake can usually be removed quite easily.

If the clothes are yellow, a tablespoonful of peroxide of hydrogen put in the water in which they are soaked will bleach them.

Brown sugar frosting which will not crack is made of one tablespoonful vinegar, brown sugar enough to mix and the beaten white of half an egg. Beat all well together and add sugar enough to spread.

Before frying the breakfast bacon, cut off the rind and dip in flour; then fry or grill quickly. This prevents the fat from running and give the bacon a better flavor.

First Long Step Towards Recovery

IS TO FIND IF YOUR SYMPTOMS ARE OF KIDNEY DISEASE.

Kent County Lady Did This—Then She Used Dodd's Kidney Pills and Was Cured.

Upper Bouctouche, Kent Co., N. B., May 31st (Special)—Miss Genevieve Bastarache, an estimable lady, living near here, is telling her friends of the benefit she has received from Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"I am indeed happy to be able to state that I have been cured of Kidney Disease by Dodd's Kidney Pills," Miss Bastarache says in an interview.

"I was often so tired I could not work. My sleep was broken and unrefreshing. I had headaches and cramps in the muscles.

"I suffered from Rheumatism and Backache and was always tired and nervous.

"I was in this miserable condition when I decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills, and I had not taken two boxes till I felt better and three boxes cured me."

Miss Bastarache made a long step towards recovery when she discovered that her symptoms were of Kidney Disease. She then had only to use the old reliable Kidney remedy, Dodd's Kidney Pills, to find a cure. She did it and was cured. Are your symptoms those of Kidney Disease?

QUEER ANIMAL TRAPS.

Not Intended as Such, but They Prove Deadly Lures.

That almost unerring instinct which carries animals through grave dangers has led in many instances in the Midway and Sunset oil fields of California to their undoing. Chief among such victims are rabbits and water fowl.

A jackrabbit and a cottontail find a nice round, smooth hole. There are many such in the oil fields, where oil piping is a necessity for the transportation of oil to the refineries. The rabbits decide to set up housekeeping there. The cottontail desires a permanent home, and the jackrabbit wants a refuge safe from malevolent man.

Soon they discover their habitat is being moved. No doubt they are frightened, but they instinctively stay within their refuge. One end of the pipe is closed. Even then they do not leave. Then the other end of the pipe is darkened. Then it is darkness eternal for the furry pair.

Some time later it is discovered that a newly laid oil pipe line is choked. After great labor the line is dismantled and the remains of many rabbits removed. Thousands of rabbits have been thus exterminated in the oil fields.

The death rate among water fowl is even greater. Again, as with the rabbits, instinct leads them to certain destruction. Every little lake of oil in the vicinity of a gusher is a trap for the unthinking birds. At twilight and dawn these tar colored lakes appear as bodies of water to the deluded fowl.—Scientific American.

FARM AND GARDEN

FOR POTATO RESULTS.

Any well-drained soil, except such as is very gravelly or light sandy, can be put in condition for growing profitable crops of potatoes. A clay loam soil, however, is preferred. Alluvial soils carrying some sand are very good.

It is best to adopt a three-year rotation for potatoes, as nearly all scab germs perish in two years intervening. In this way the crop is affected very little with scab. In this rotation the farmer is able to secure excellent crops of wheat and grass following potatoes, and it also gives an excellent chance to apply stable manure any time during the previous season to planting. Thirty to fifty loads can be applied per acre, as early in winter as possible. To apply large quantities of manure just before planting roughens the skins of the tubers, making them less attractive, though it will not produce scab. Commercial fertilizers give smoothness, color and appearance to the tubers.

Most potato growers prefer commercial fertilizers for growing the crop, for the main reason that stable manure can be used to better advantage with other crops. Besides, it is claimed that a better quality of potatoes can be grown with commercial fertilizer than with barnyard manure.

In the spring the ground should be harrowed as soon as it is dry enough not to mud. Harrow until the dead furrow cannot be seen. Use a ton fertilizer to the acre, half at planting time, and the other half after, and after the potatoes are an inch or so high, bury in with the plants as the fertilizer is applied.

Plant medium-sized whole potatoes. They will average about four stalks to the hill, and will stand more fertilizer than cut seed. Whole potatoes should be planted especially when couch grass is present in the land. About 15 bushels to the acre is a good planting.

Hill the potatoes twice when they are 15 to 20 inches high.

Spraying is an important operation, which prevents loss from blight or other diseases. Cover the vines completely with Bordeaux mixture, and in order to do it thoroughly it is best to go over and back on the same rows at each spraying. Then if any places have been missed in the first trip they are caught on the return. Both sides of the plant should be covered.

A good Bordeaux mixture is made of equal parts of lime and blue vitriol. Some farmers make stock solutions—taking 50 pounds of vitriol in a bag and hanging it about three or four inches deep in 50 gallons of water. Slack 50 pounds of lime in a barrel and then fill with water to 50 gallons. A copper wire strainer, 20 meshes to the inch, is used, and the solution strained into the spraying tank. When spraying, the tank is filled half full of clear water, in which is then put five gallons of lime wash.

Some farmers do not use Paris green, as it affects the potatoes, after causing the loss of blossoms.

THE WHY OF YELLOW BUTTER.

Yellow butter is due, primarily, to the character of the feed the cow receives. This is the conclusion drawn by the United States Department of Agriculture from the results of experiments conducted in co-operation with the Missouri Experiment Station. These experiments show that, while the color of butter is to some extent a breed characteristic, it can be increased or diminished by changing the animal's ration. Chemical tests show that the yellow pigment found in green plants, carrots and yellow autumn leaves. These pigments pass directly from the plant into the milk. This explains the well-known fact that fresh green grass and carrots increase the yellowness of butter, which is the only standard by which the average person judges its richness. A large portion of these pigments are deposited in the body fat and elsewhere in the cow. The yellowness of the milk does not diminish as rapidly as it otherwise would when the ration is changed to one having less pigment, because the cow draws on this stored-up supply. The yellowness increases, however, as soon as the necessary plant pigments are restored to the ration. Green grass and green corn will produce the highest colored butter, while bleached clover hay and yellow corn will produce butter lack in color. It is indisputably true that the breed does influence the color of the milk fat, but if the ration is varied there will be a corresponding variation of the color of the milk fat of any breed. The body fat of cattle of the Jersey and Guernsey breeds frequently is of such a deep yellow color that butchers and consumers discriminate against it. This prejudice has no justification. The yellowness of the body fat comes from the same source as the yellowness of the milk fat. There is no reason why consumers should object to one and demand the other.

NOTES.

Do not set strawberries too deep. The roots should be well spread out and the plants set no deeper than it originally grew in the field.

Breeding and feeding is not all. Watch the market and plan to finish the hogs at a time when you will not find a glutted market.

In the early stages the balky horse is made by the balky driver. A high-strung, nervous horse is easily ruined by bad driving.

Tomatoes are grown with entire success in all types of soils. The sandy loams are considered superior, and with most varieties such soils produce smoother fruit. Clay soils, however, are favorable to large yields, and if earliness is not a consideration, the results may be entirely satisfactory.

Bad ventilation and damp quarters cause more disease among fowls than any one other cause.

Sickly thrift is induced by lack of care. A careless shepherd invariably makes poor sheep.

A wide stall is dangerous. The horse may lie down and try to roll and get fast. Five feet will hit it about right.

A scrub calf from a scrub bull and cow will seldom pay for the time and feed consumed, no matter how judiciously fed, or whether reared for milking or beef purposes.

Good roads not only bring the market nearer to you, but they improve the social condition of your community because they bind neighbors and friends more closely.

Feeding and care are as important in turning out a good hog. They will sometimes make a good hog out of a runt, but lack of them will always make a runt out of a good pig.

It's either a darkened stable or milk for early and late these days. Flies give the cows no peace.

ARMOUR & CO.
HAMILTON, ONTARIO

An Indian Red Riding Hood.

A Labrador missionary, says Mortimer Batten, in the August Wide World Magazine, told me a curious story which occurred on the Labrador coast some years ago. One night the little daughter of a certain brave was missing, and, on discovering the child's tracks in the snow, a party of squaws set out to look for her. What was their alarm when a little way from the camp, they found that the footprints of a great grey wolf accompanied those of the child. The brute did not appear to have harmed her, but had apparently trotted along ahead, enticing the child farther and farther from camp. In all probability the child mistook it for a dog and followed readily, though the superstitious Indians, of course, believed that the brute had exercised some devilish influence over her. Darkness was creeping on, and, though much afraid, the squaws continued to follow the tracks of the wolf and the child. Night found them far from home, when what was their horror to find that they themselves had been surrounded by wolves. Only one squaw survived the night of horror that ensued, to return next morning to bear tidings of the calamity to camp.

H S Win Again

In an exciting and fast game of baseball played on Tuesday evening, the High School team defeated the Knechtel Factory nine by the score of 9-7. Having defeated the Rattan Factory and the Knechtel Factory teams each twice, the High School now claims the championship of the town. The batteries for Tuesday's game were; Knechtels, Reinhardt, Schefter Yaeck, and Wallace. High School—Wilson and Rennie.

The County Grants

The same grant as last year was made to Continuation schools. The grants to High Schools were slightly changed so as to make the amount payable by the County to each High School double the Legislative grant to such schools. This will increase the grants to Chesley and Port Elgin slightly. The usual grants of $1500 to the Walkerton Hospital and $1000 to Kincardine Hospital were made and a grant of $50 each to Tiverton and Hepworth they getting no school or other moneys from the County.

Returned from France

Mr. Jno. Russell, son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Russel who joined the first Canadian contingent and went to France, arrived home last week, having been declared physically unfit by the medical officers after crossing the English channel.

Bowling Note

The final game in the President vs Vice President series was played at the bowling green on Tuesday evening, McNab for the Vice defeated Lay by a score of 21-10. As the former games played gave the Vice President a lead of 8 shots, he was 10 shots up in the series.

Brought to Gaol.

Robert Brown of Hepworth was brought to gaol here on Friday last on a charge of stealing a bicycle from the hotel in that village. After making the theft Brown struck out for Owen Sound, but was caught by the police before reaching that city. He will be tried before Judge Klein on Saturday morning at ten o'clock.

Thumb Broken.

While practicing baseball at the exhibition grounds on Wednesday evening last, Sal Kroetsch a member of the Telescope staff had the misfortune to be struck on the thumb by a pitched ball, with the result that he is now nursing a badly fractured member. The accident will necessitate his being off work for some time.

Applied for Papers.

Gustave Cupsky of Hepworth and Rev. Mosig of Walkerton, applied to the court on Tuesday for their naturalization papers. Cupsky was refused, while in the case of Mosig, Mr. W. J. McNally objected to the papers being granted until an investigation was held and this will take place in the court room before Judge Klein on Friday next at 10 a m.

Defeated Wroxeter

Quite a number of Walkerton football enthusiasts saw the Mildmay football team defeat Wroxeter in a W. F. A. game in Mildmay on Thursday last, the final score being [illegible]. Armond Whitehead and Walter Schnurr were on the Mildmay line-up. Winning this game puts our southern neighbors in good running for the district championship.

Death of Mrs. Schneider.

The death occured on Saturday morning at her residence opposite the G. T. R. freight sheds of Mrs. Jos. Schneider after a lengthy illness. The deceased who was 65 years of age, moved to Walkerton about five years ago, when her son, the late Geo. Schneider took possession of the station hotel and has resided here since. Besides her husband she is survived by one daughter and two sons who live in Rochester. The funeral took place to the Walkerton cemetery on Monday afternoon.

Receiving Degree of B. A.

Mr. Bert Schumacher, son of Mr. and Mrs. Schumacher of Walkerton, has been successful in passing his final examinations at Campion College, Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, and will receive the degree of B. A. The commencement exercises at which Bert will have the degree conferred upon him will be held at the college on June 10th. Mr. and Mrs. Schumacher will attend the exercises, and will spend a month visiting in the States.

Caskenette-Mosack

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at the R. C. Church on Wednesday morning at 9.30 o'clock. Rev. Fr. Montag of Deemerton officiating, when Miss Elizabeth Mosack, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Mosack was united in marriage to Mr. Leo. Caskenette of Preston, formerly of Walkerton. After the ceremony, the wedding party repaired to the bride's home where a pleasant time was spent. Mr. and Mrs. Caskenette, will reside in Preston and their many friends here wish them much happiness in their new sphere of life.

H. S. Defeated Hanover

The local High School made up for their 19-6 defeat in Hanover on the 24th by winning from the Hanover senior Y. M. C. A. team last Saturday at the exhibition grounds by the score of 21-0. The locals have won two of the three games played and plainly showed their superiority on Saturday. The lineup was as follows:

Game Postponed

The Junior O. A. L. A lacrosse match which was scheduled to be played here to-night, (Thursday, 10th,) between the Hanover and Walkerton teams has been postponed and will be played on Friday evening of next week.

Show Your Colors.

Durham street presented an attractive appearance on Thursday last, the King's birthday, a large number of merchants showing their loyalty to their King and Country by decorating their places of business with the Union Jack. A good many of these flags have been left flying, which at this time is a good idea, and every storekeeper should follow suit. It is not only for the storekeepers, however, for householders in the residential sections should decorate their houses in like/ manner. If you are a Canadian, show your colors and patriotism, buy a flag and set the grand old rag flying in the breeze.

An Excellent Concert.

The concert given by the Royal Welsh Ladies Choir of Cardiff, Wales, under the direction of Madame Hughes Thomas in Knox church on Friday evening was fairly well attended but was deserving of better patronage. The programme consisted of solos, duets, trios, quartettes and choruses, and all was so well rendered that the audience, which was an appreciative one, loudly encored every number. The proceeds of the evening amounted to $63.75. The choir also attended service in the Knox church on Sunday and at the conclusion of the evening service gave a special song service, at which the attendance was so large that the seating capacity of the church was taxed to the utmost. The special collection taken in aid of Knox choir amounted to $41.00. Music lovers of Walkerton who heard the choir hope the choir will be secured for a return engagement in the near future.

Not Known Here.

The following despatch from Niagara Falls, dated June 3rd appeared in Friday's dailies; —

"A suicide note dated at this city May 24th, and signed Genevieve Carruthers and Nelson Grand, was found in a bottle floating in the Niagara River at Lewiston, by Jacob Carpenter, a fisherman, this morning. The note says the writers' were tired of life. It directs that the note be sent to post office box, 152, Walkerton, Ont."

On investigation it was found that the subscribers to box 152, had no knowledge of the couple mentioned in the despatch, nor had the names ever been heard. However as the parties renting box 152, have friends and relatives in Niagara Falls, it is presumed that the incident is merely a practical joke and that the names given are fictitious ones.

Pte. Hanley Wounded.

Private Wm. P. Hanley reported as wounded in the casualty list issued by the Militia Department, Ottawa, June 3rd, is a son of Mr. Timothy Hanley Chepstow, and a nephew of Dr. Thomas O'Hagen the well known Canadian writer. He is a printer by trade having served his apprenticeship in the office of the Telescope. About 1913 Private Hanley went to the Canadian Northwest and it was there that he joined the 23rd, battalion Company C of the second contingent. This was late last autumn and at New Year's he got leave of absence from Valcartier, Quebec and visited his father and his uncle, Patrick O'Hagen, at Paisley. One of the last letters received from Private Hanley showed that he had been transferred from the 23rd bat. to the 13th. Private Hanley was evidently wounded in the recent engagement in which the Canadians took a German position in an orchard. In his letter of the 12th of May to his uncle, Dr. O'Hagen, Hanley writes:—"I can here the roar of the guns from where I am now, and I think that the hot lead and the cold steel of the Canadians are too much for them." Private Hanley is about 30 years of age and unmarried. The nature of his wounds is not known to his Canadian friends.

Should not Criticise.

The Herald and Times still continues to throw mud at the Telescope, but as usual we pay little heed to our contemporary's raillery. However, the Times man is in no position to criticize any newspaper, no matter how degraded in journalism it may be, for his own sins are of the blackest. For instance take last weeks' issue of the Herald and Times. Can one fathom the discomfiture of a mother-to-be, on reading that she had given birth to a child, when she had not yet become a mother, as was the case in last week's issue of the Times! In another item, the editor, in reporting the police court case in which two boys figured, mentioned the name of one youth, and excluded the other, merely because the latter's father is a subscriber to his paper and the almighty dollar looks big to him, and another item reporting the theft of a watch, he made so many misstatements, that Chief Ferguson was threatened with dismissal from office, as a result. We may be a great sinner, but the Times man can easily go one better.

Threw Stones Through Windows.

In the early hours of Wednesday morning some miscreant who apparently takes joy in the destroying other people's property or disturbing the peaceful night's slumber of other citizens, hurled a large stone with great force through a window of the residence of O. F. Klein. Beyond breaking the window, and destroying the blind, however, no damage was done. On hearing the crash and investigating, Mr. Klein notified Chief Ferguson who patrolled the streets in the darkness for nearly two hours but could discover no clue as to the perpetrator. The following morning Mr. Chas. Petteplace also reported to the authorities that he had been disturbed in like manner, two windows being broken. Constables Ferguson and Armstrong are investigating the case. What the guilty party is to gain by such a despicable act, we are at a loss to understand and if he is apprehended, he is liable to a prison term, for this is a serious offence in the eyes of the law.

Struck by Shrapnel

After a suspense of nearly two weeks since he received the first notice of his son, Capt McNalley, being wounded, Mr. W. J. McNalley was much relieved on Tuesday when he received the following letter from the Captain, which he wrote just after receiving his wound,—

Princess Hotel
Hospital, Boulogne,
20-5-15

Dear Dad;

Now I know that you will be worrying because even if they notify you of the nature of my injury you will not be satisfied as to its seriousness.

Well, a piece of shrapnel about the size of a one cent match box came down at a very steep angle and caught me in the muscle of my left leg about three inches above the knee. On account of the steep angle at which it came down I do not think that it did more than make a deep jagged cut and then fall to the ground. However I will have it X-rayed to see that there are no bits of shrapnel left there. My leg has become very stiff and sore to move, but I could scarcely have been hit in any other spot without more serious results.

I will probably be back into it again in a couple of weeks. I will write you a detailed account when I reach England.

Your Son,
Arthur.

LETTER FROM DR. FRASER

The following letter has been received by Mr. Collins from Dr. Fraser today and as it may be of interest to the doctor's many friends to hear how he is getting along during these strenuous times. We give the most of it.

France, May 21 1915

This has not been much of a holiday here. The Canadians are in action again and I was up all last night. The Canadian cavalry were in action but as infantry not cavalry. There is a brigade formed of the Strathcona Horse, R. C. D. S. and King Edward Horse, under command of Gen Seeley. This is the Col. Seely you remember reading so much about at the outbreak of the war. Minister of War was he not? You will be pleased to know I was mentioned in despatches after the battle of Ypres. I got a German helmet for you the second day after the scrap; only sorry the Kaiser's head wasn't inside it. The British fellows, a few of whom came in last night with our men, say the Canadians are beggars to fight. The Germans squeal when they see a Canadian coming. The boys go right at them and I don't blame them. Several cases last night were wounds made by reversing the bullets which make a horrible mess of things.

One thing I have not yet seen a bayonet wound by a German. We had a German officer go through the hospital yesterday. I think myself the German infantry are quitters but their artillery is deadly, and they are reckless with their ammunition. The destruction of Ypres was simply awful and looked like pure devil's work. Even after troops stopped going through it they still hammered away at it. We have some Indian tents here which make the best kind of tent. They are low but cool and have more room. We are just getting our tent up now to sleep in. If Hall comes out as transport officer tell him to tent with the Quarter master. He can get anything he wants. I laid my tobacco pouch down last night for a few minutes in the hospital and when I went to get it, it was lost or picked up. I told the Quarter Master about it and he immediately produced another. He has charge of all the stores. The boys are beginning to pick up lots of souvenirs from the trenches. You can imagine what that means. The other day I saw a Battalion coming back, and there were about a dozen at the head all, with helmets and an improvised German band—mouthorgans, flutes, empty biscuit tins etc. They have been going at it pretty bad for the last week, I mean the fighting. Am keeping well and the fine weather makes things a little more pleasant. Kind regards to all

Jim.

THE JUNE SESSIONS.

The June sessions of the County Court of Bruce are in progress at the court house this week. The court was opened at 1 p. m. Tuesday, by Judge A. B. Klein. There were five cases on the docket viz:—

Callum vs. Roberts.

An action brought to recover commission for purchasing cattle. This suit was settled out of court.

Rudolph vs. Wench.

This is a slander action the principles of which hail from Paisley.

McKenzie vs. Westman.

This suit was instituted by McKenzie a Toronto real estate agent for the collection of a note given to him when Westman a resident of Bruce township purchased some western property. Westman in turn has entered a counter claim asking that the note be set aside on account of fraud.

McKay vs. McFarlane.

In which Geo. McKay formerly Deputy Registrar sued W. H. McFarlane for wrongful dismissal and slander asking damages.

McFarlane vs. McKay.

This was a counter action in which Mr. McFarlane sued Geo. McKay for slander and recovery of some money, asking [illegible] damages.

The first business was the reading of two applications for naturalization papers, both of which the court for the time being refused to grant.

After this was concluded, Mr. D. Robertson K.C. addressed Judge Klein on behalf of himself and fellow-members of the bar of Bruce congratulating His Worship on his recent appointment to the position of Senior Judge of the County of Bruce. Judge Klein made a very suitable reply, thanking Mr. Robertson and the other lawyers for their thoughtfulness and reviewed his life in the courts, going back to '60 when the judge, in his boyhood, walked from Neustadt to Walkerton to take his place in the law office of W. D. Ross, and continuing gave those in the court a slight insight into his history. Two days after coming to Walkerton the judge met Mr. Robertson whom in the intervening years he has known intimately, having practiced with him, fought cases with him and been a close friend in every day life. The judge concluded by assuring the court that to the best of his ability he would continue to see that justice was given in the courts of Bruce.

As the two first cases were of great importance locally, Judge Klein declined to hear them and his place on the bench was taken by Judge Widdifield of Owen Sound.

Geo. D. McKay Wins Suit.

McKAY VS. McFARLANE.

The first case to come before the court was the action of George D. McKay former Deputy Registrar against W. H. McFarlane charging him with slander. The particulars leading to this case are familiar to the majority of our readers. It will be remembered that in January last Mr. McFarlane who had been Registrar for some time, dismissed Mr. McKay from his service for which action he was so criticized in the local papers that they now have libel suits pending. Mr. McKay considered that his dismissal was unfair, and hearing that Mr. McFarlane was circulating stories that were detrimental to his character, he entered suit. There were many witnesses on the plaintiff side and all told about the same story, that Mr. McFarlane had accused his deputy of taking money that did not belong to him, both by raising his salary without his consent and otherwise, to the amount of about $250.00.

The evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses showed that the defendant's statements had been detrimental to Mr. McKay's good name and as one witness put it, inferred that he was not a trustworthy servant. When this side of the case was heard, which was well on in the afternoon, Mr. Klein asked for a non-suit, but His Worship stated that there was ample evidence to send the case to the jury. McFarlane the defendant then entered the witness box. He proved a very unwilling witness and claimed to have made the statements which he did on the strength of the report of Mr. Somerhayes whom he brought from Toronto to audit the books. At the conclusion of Mr. McFarlane's evidence the court adjourned until 9.30 Wednesday morning. When the court was reopened, Mr. Somerhayes was placed in the stand. He being the man who was brought from Toronto to point out errors and deficiencies in Mr. McKay's work and as it was on his report that the charges were made by Mr. McFarlane, he was an important witness. By his books and report, he attempted to show and explain to the court where these mistakes were and where Mr. McKay as was alleged had taken money which did not rightfully belong to him. His evidence, however was picked to pieces by Mr. Robertson for the plaintiff, and when Mr. McKay took the stand, he explained to the court where he had paid out money for copying and other work which had been done but which in the auditor's report had not appeared, and also explained where this money which he is alleged to have misappropriated had been paid out.

Miss Ross, an employee of the Registry office corroborated Mr. McKay's evidence on some important points.

This concluded the case and the two counsels addressed the jury at great length. The judge's address which followed was a masterly summing up of the entire case in which His Worship spoke very favorably for the plaintiff.

The jury retired at 5 o'clock and at 7.15 returned a verdict for Mr. McKay, awarding him $50 damages. Who is to pay the costs has not yet been arranged.

At the opening of the court this morning, the hearing of the other suits between Mr. McKay and Mr. McFarlane was postponed until the fall owing to the illness of a witness.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

"But Jacques has not forgotten him. Did you note his suffering when I spoke to him of his friend? His face, a moment before so fresh and smiling, was ghastly and distorted. It was frightful. He looked like a death's head. Our friend Davidoff, you will remember, described with curious minuteness the moral condition of the sick man cured through faith. The foundation of this recovery is 'frail,'" he said; "a word would suffice to destroy it. The passionate conviction which brought Jacques back to life, once weakened, he would relapse into a condition worse than before. He is under a sort of spell. He is possessed by an idea, and this gives him wonderful strength."

"That is what makes charlatans and quacks succeed," said the doctor.

"And then, there are besides imaginary invalids whom it is easy to cure, and our friend Jacques seems to be one of them."

Patrizzi shook his head and said gravely:

"I hope it may be so, for his mother's sake."

A noisy exclamation cut short those words. A group of masqueraders pushed through the crowd, in the midst of exclamations and bursts of laughter. The group of which the Neapolitan was the centre broke up, and each of the young men went his own way. Jacques, his new acquaintance on his arm, had gone out into the corridor, examining curiously the masked and hooded woman who drew him along, with a rapid step, as if she feared to be recognized or spoken to. Arrived at the door of one of the stage boxes, she gave two quick knocks. A woman opened the door, and drawing aside, with a silent smile, allowed them to pass. She then discreetly left the room and closed the door of the box. Here Jacques and the domino found themselves alone.

The young man approached his companion and attempted to seize her hand.

"Be sensible, or I shall send you back to your friends."

"How can one be sensible near you?" he cried, smiling. "Ask something that is possible, not something that is impossible."

"You must obey me, however, or I shall go away, and we will never meet again."

"And if I consent to everything you exact, shall we see each other again then?"

"Certainly."

She sat down on the divan in the box, and leaned back, showing between her mask and her domino her white neck, and under the ruching of her hood an ear, delicate and pink as a rose-leaf. He sat down beside her, with an air of respectful propriety, although his heart beat passionately, so soon had this mysterious and fascinating creature succeeded in bewildering his senses.

Hidden in the obscurity of the box, close beside each other, Jacques and the masked woman were absolutely alone, more free than if silence and solitude reigned around them. In a low and insinuating voice he said:

"It seems to me that you are not unknown to me, and that we have met before. Will you not show me your face? I am sure you would not lose by doing so. You are young, and I am sure you are beautiful. Have you any reason, then, for wishing to remain unknown?"

She nodded affirmatively.

"Even to me?"

She nodded again.

The young man drew nearer.

"Where have I seen you?" he asked. "Here, in Paris?"

She did not answer.

He resumed.

"Do you live in Nice?"

She remained silent.

"We have met before, however, have we not?"

A smile crossed the lips of the unknown. She pushed Jacques away gently, her gaze seeming to dwell on him with pleasure, and said in a low voice:

"You are very inquisitive."

"And why should I not be so? Everything tells that it is my fate to love you, and yet it surprises you that I should wish to know who you are! I shall know to-morrow or the day me to-night, this very instant, and permit me to see your face? Would you have me love you, then, without knowing who you are?"

"Perhaps," she murmured.

"What are you afraid of? The anger of some jealous tyrant? Or perhaps you have not confidence in my discretion?"

She did not stir, thus giving room to the most romantic suppositions in his mind.

He smiled, and said passionately:

"Be it so then! I will love you as you are,—unknown, masked, mysterious."

He tried to take her hand again. Sudddenly the hood of her domino fell back, and her mask, becoming displaced, disclosed to view her face.

Jacques started to his feet, stepped back, and cried in amazement:

"Clemence Villa!"

At the sound of her name the actress became calm and cold. She looked at Jacques, who, pale and motionless was devouring her with his eyes. Throwing back her domino with a quick movement, she rose and stood before him in all her radiant beauty.

"You desired to know my name," she said. "You know it now."

Jacques, without looking at her, said slowly:

"It is a very short time since poor Pierre killed himself on your account."

"On my account?" she returned quickly. "Are you quite sure of that?"

Jacques grew paler still, and looking at Clemence with a glance of terror:

"Do you believe it was on some other person's account, then?" he said, resuming his seat on the sofa beside her.

"Do you not know that it was?"

She looked at him fixedly, he turned his head away, but seizing his arm with authority.

"It was with me he spent his last evening," she said. "It was to me he addressed his last words. I know what everyone else, even Davidoff, is ignorant of. Pierre, weary of his feverish existence, disillusioned regarding his genius, and hopeless of the future, grew despondent, and in obedience to I know not what superstitious idea resolved to sacrifice his life for the sake of a beloved friend."

"Be silent!" interrupted Jacques, almost menacingly.

"Why should I be silent? Are you afraid of his ghost? I would neither injure nor reproach you. He knew that I loved you. He said to me, at the moment when he took his fatal resolution: 'He will love you better than I can. And if anything of what I was survives in him it will be a bond that shall attach me to earth and make me thrill with joy in my grave.'"

At this sacrilegious falsehood, the young man cast a glance of terror at Clemence. He made an effort to rise and leave her, but his limbs refused him their support, and he sank back on the sofa faint and trembling. He felt that she had spoken the truth, and that a mysterious tie bound him already to this woman, as if Pierre had transmitted his unconquerable passion for her to him with his soul. He rebelled against this bondage, however, and forgetful of his recent eagerness to win her favor, he now desired to leave the woman he had so ardently wooed while she was as yet unknown to him. He rebelled against the thought of obeying a dead man's command; he could not consent to be the executor of his posthumous caprices. He called to his aid a last remnant of his former courage, coolness and resolution, and rising turned a calm countenance toward Clemence.

"I shall not allow myself to be vanquished by your spells, beautiful enchantress," he said. "Besides, it was useless to call in the aid of ghosts to enslave me. Your lips and your eyes would have been sufficient. You made a great mistake in mingling sorcery with love. I should be afraid now of your philters."

"I shall have no need to use them with you," responded Clemence in a tranquil voice, "and whether you wish it or not you shall acknowledge my power."

He opened his lips to answer her in the negative, but before he could speak she had glided to the door and vanished like a phantom from the box.

Left alone, Jacques remained for a moment thoughtful. The dancing went on, noisy and uproarious, raising clouds of dust through which the light of the ball-room shone dimly. In the boxes, the spectators, leaning their elbows on the velvet-covered railings, formed gay and brilliant groups. This overheated room, with its glare and noise, was pervaded by a sense of intense life. The young man suddenly remembered the miserable existence he had so short a time ago been leading, and an ardent joy filled his heart at the thought that he was once more well and strong, and free to share in the enjoyment of a scene like this, after having given up, as he had done, the hope of ever being able to do so again.

How often had he said to himself with bitter longing: "Oh, if I could but cast aside this languor, if I could be well and strong again, with what zest would I enjoy life!" And this dream had become a reality. The charm had produced its miraculous effects. Death had abandoned his prey. Or rather he had chosen another victim in his place, nobler and more brilliant than he. At this thought the pale face of Pierre Laurier rose before Jacques' mental vision. With closed eyes, a bitter smile upon his lips, and purple shadows on his temples, the painter slept his last sleep, rocked by the ceaseless motion of the waves, caressed by the sunlight, lulled by the murmur of the breeze. A wanderer on the surface of the ocean, he rose and fell with the tide, forever approaching and forever receding from the earth on which he had suffered so much. Jacques followed with his mental gaze this corpse, this waif of the waters, terrified by the sinister apparition, yet, egotist as he was, reassured by the thought that his friend was indeed dead, since it was with his life he now lived. He desired to shake off the nightmare that so painfully oppressed him. He rose to his feet, and the spell was broken.

Before him he saw only the gallery filled with spectators of the scene below, at his feet the floor of the parquette, occupied by a motley crowd of dancers. What had seemed the roar of the waves was the sound of their voices and the stamping of their feet upon the floor, the murmur of the wind was the strains of the orchestra. There had been no apparition, everything was real. He felt eager and vigorous. And pleasure was within his grasp.

He passed his hand over his forehead, a smile crossed his face; he opened the door of the box, went out into the corridor and walked nonchalantly through the crowd. Near the foyer he saw Patrizzi, who was flirting with a pretty actress. He approached the prince with all the boisterous gayety of his wildest days, and said:

"Shall we go and have some supper, prince? There must be at least a dozen of our friends here whom we could get to join us. I think we have had all the enjoyment there is to be had in this place. Shall we leave it?"

"What have you done with the domino who carried you off so unceremoniously just now?" asked the Neapolitan. "Have you asked her to be one of the party? Is she to accompany us?"

"Oh, I came away and left her by herself."

"You did not find the interview amusing, then?"

"It was lugubrious."

"Did she not give you a rendezvous for to-morrow?"

"Yes, but I shall not go."

As he pronounced these words a crowd of masqueraders rushed into the corridor, and a shrill laugh was heard. Jacques turned pale. He looked around in terror for the white domino, but he saw only a group of young men hurrying past in pursuit of some women in fancy dress. A voice murmured in his ear: "Why do you boast and lie? Do you not know that you will keep your appointment?" And it seemed to him that the voice was that of Clemence Villa. He turned around. Only Patrizzi was near him. "I am losing my senses," he said to himself. He took the arm of the prince, and saying with feverish eagerness, "Come, let us go," he drew him away.

Next day when he awoke in his chamber at the villa of Beaulieu at about 11 o'clock in the morning, he had only a vague recollection of what had taken place the night before. He remembered that at supper he had drunk a great deal of champagne, and that he had played a waltz for the women to dance to.

From this moment everything was buried in oblivion. He had been taken home in a carriage by a friend, who was returning to Eze. What had he said? What had he done? All was shrouded in a mystery which he had no desire to penetrate.

Stretched on his bed, his eyes drinking in the sunlight that flooded the room, he felt an exquisite sense of well being. This recumbent posture, which had seemed to him so irksome when he was shaken by his violent fits of coughing that left him bathed in perspiration, weak and exhausted, he now enjoyed with delight, his brain clear, his blood flowing calmly in his veins, his respiration regular. He had stayed up all night, he had supped, he had squandered his strength in one of those orgies which formerly would cost him a week's illness and depression and yet he found himself fresh and vigorous. He experienced a sense of profound satisfaction. The cure, so confidently predicted by his doctor, but of which he himself had had so little hope, had indeed been effected.

He remained thus for a time, enjoying the mere sense of being; then, springing at a bound from the bed, he began to dress. He went about his room, humming an air, careless and happy. He opened his window, and the warm breeze entered and played around his brow. The fragrance of the clematis reached him from the garden below, and on the terrace, walking toward him slowly, as he had walked a few months before, he perceived his sister.

Her eyes were cast on the ground with an air of sadness, and she seemed, in her dark gown, as if she were in mourning for her lost happiness—her health, her youth, her gayety. The contrast between what she had been and what she now was, was so striking that Jacques could not repress a sigh. Disease had abandoned her grasp on him, but as if a victim were necessary, she had seized instead upon poor Juliette. And in proportion as he became more erect and vigorous, she grew more bowed and feeble. The malady from which she suffered was one that medical science could not reach. From the day on which Dr. Davidoff had brought them the fatal news of Pierre's death, she had declined hourly in health. A profound languor had taken possession of her; she seldom spoke, and seized every opportunity to be alone. She seemed to feel a pleasure in her suffering. She disliked to be questioned about her health, she made an effort, when with her mother and brother, to shake off her melancholy, but as soon as she found herself alone, she relapsed into her habitual sadness. At the moment when Jacques perceived her she was walking with languid step, a prey to her own sad thoughts, and under the brilliant sunshine, amid the vivid green of the trees and the gay colors of the flowers, her face looked like a dark blot upon the landscape. Jacques descended into the garden, and observing his mother in the drawing-room went in and kissed her. She looked at him attentively, and seeing him so radiant with health, she smiled.

"You returned home late," she said. "It is hardly prudent for you to sit up so late, when you have so recently recovered from your illness."

"It is so long since I have had any pleasure," he answered.

"You enjoyed yourself, at least?" she asked.

"Very much."

"Do not abuse your health, my child. Do not be ungrateful to Providence who has restored it to you. And do not add to my anxieties. I am troubled enough about your sister's condition."

"Is she worse to-day?"

"No. And then how should we know it if she were? She utters no complaint. She makes every effort to conceal her dejection. But she cannot deceive me. Day by day I see her grow weaker. Ah, if Davidoff, who benefited you so much, were only here now!"

At these words the young man turned pale.

He fancied he saw the sardonic countenance of the Russian doctor rise before him. What could Davidoff do? Was he to be asked to work another miracle? Jacques knew very well how powerless was medical science. He knew how useless it was in his own case. The help he had received had come to him from an unknown source. But was it not at the price of a terrible sacrifice that this help had been obtained? Had it not been necessary to vitalize and purify his blood, that the blood of another should be shed for him? And was not this voluntary sacrifice of a human life to save that of another, marked out for destruction by the hand of fate, a repetition of the human sacrifices offered up on the altars of the pagan gods of antiquity? Could the miracle be wrought a second time? And who should make the sacrifice? Pierre had made it for him. Who would make it for Juliette?

The sound of his mother's voice drew him from his meditation.

"Besides," she added, "even if the doctor were here, would Juliette follow his directions? When she is asked about her health she answers that she is not ill, that she is only a little tired; that there is no cause for anxiety. But this very indifference makes me all the more uneasy, because in it I see the indication of a moral cause for her malady, more difficult to combat than any physical one."

"A moral cause!" repeated Jacques.

"Yes, the child has a secret grief and notwithstanding the courageous efforts she makes to conceal it, she cannot deceive me. Each morning I see that she is paler than the last from the sleepless hours she has spent during the night. And it has been so for the past two months. Oh, I know the exact date of the commencement of her malady. It has remained indelibly fixed upon my memory. It is both a sad and a happy one for me for it marks at once the beginning of your recovery and the beginning of the illness of your sister. Yes, Juliette received the blow from which she is now suffering on the day when Dr. Davidoff came to announce to us the death of Pierre Laurier."

If Madame de Vignes had been observing Jacques she would have been terrified by the look of anguish that distorted his features. What he had already vaguely suspected his mother had put into words. The death of Pierre had produced at once a salutary and a pernicious effect; it had restored him to life and given her deathblow to Juliette.

Beware the Rat.

The rat is a menace.

Much filth is fostered by rats.

Wary and cunning, the rat is hard to fight.

Plague carrying has been proven against rats.

The rat is the chief carrier of the deadly bubonic plague.

Many parasites infest the hairy body of the filthy rat.

Rats are subject to leprosy and other diseases which may be transmitted.

The spread of trichinosis is attributed to rats by scientific authorities.

Making its home in sewers and dirt dumps, it is described as "the worst mammal pest in the United States."

How Railroads Have Grown.

To show how rapidly railroads developed in the United States, in 1829 there were only 3 miles, in 1830 42 miles, in 1840 2,800 miles and in 1850 50,000 miles. The present railroad mileage in the United States is upward of 250,000 miles, or equal to several tracks around the globe, while the total mileage of the world is more than 640,000 miles, all built in less than a hundred years.

MARRY, YOUNG MAN.

(Detroit Free Press.)

There are unthinking, featherheaded married men to be found. But matrimony and property-owning are great tamers of the male human spirit. And they commend the individual to the attention of employers. The moral is obvious. Marry, young man, buy a home and you'll prosper and be happy.

Industry.

It argues, indeed, no small strength of mind to persevere in the habits of industry without the pleasure of perceiving those advantages which, like the hands of a clock, while they make hourly approaches to their point, yet proceed so slowly as to escape observation.—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

IT WAS A NICE STEAK

And the Emergency Chef Thought His Cooking Improved It.

"My, but I'd like a big juicy steak," said Patrolman Timothy Sullivan, smacking his lips.

"I'm with you," echoed Policeman John Smith.

"And I'll get the steak if somebody'll cook it," said Policeman Geo. Moss, who happened to be in the South Chicago station at the time.

The steak was brought and Policeman Leslie Fisher offered to act as chef. He took the thick piece of beef down to the old stove in the basement of the station on which patrolmen on night duty prepare "emergency grub."

A short while later Fisher placed the steaming steak in front of Tim, George and John. After a large portion of the steak had disappeared in great gulps, Tim, frothing at the mouth, expressed his opinion of Patrolman Fisher between hiccups. And each hiccup was accompanied by a creamy spurt of lather. John, with one hand to his mouth, dragged Fisher to the stove and smelled the frying pan.

"Which can of grease d-did you use?" he spluttered.

Fisher pointed to the can on the shelf. John looked at it and blanched.

"S-soft s-soap," he cried, spitting suds.

"As a c-cook you'd make a good b-barber," frothed Tim. "We wanted a thick meal, not a shampoo."

"Well, no one has ever complained of my laundered steaks before," argued Fisher, with a twinkle. "You see soap—"

He ducked out of the door just as a frying pan and a can of soft soap crashed against the jambs.—Chicago Tribune.

Ruskin's Political Views.

Ruskin was once a candidate for the rectorship of Glasgow university and flew into a rage when asked by a deputation of the students whether his political sympathies lay with Beaconsfield or with Gladstone. "What in the devil's name," he exclaimed, "have you to do with either Disraeli or Gladstone? You are students at the university and have no more business with politics than you have with rat catching. Had you ever read the words of mine with understanding you would have known that I care no more either for Mr. Disraeli or Mr. Gladstone than for two old bagpipes with the drones going by steam, but that I hate all Liberalism as I do Beelzebub, and that with Carlyle I stand, we two alone in England—for God and the queen."—London Express.

Thousands Are Ailing From Constipation

No condition causes so many diseases as constipation. It not only prevents proper kidney action, but causes Anaemia, Stomach Trouble and Indigestion.

Why not use Dr. Hamilton's Pills and get cured? This excellent medicine restores normal bowel action in one night, thousands say so.

Just think of it! Your system will be pure and clean. You'll be free from headaches, sour stomach, biliousness—in short, you'll have jovial spirits and perfect good health. Get a 25c box of Dr. Hamilton's Pills to-day. At all dealers.

Diet When Reducing.

The question of food is important to the woman reducing; and not so much the quantity as the quality; not how much, but what you eat. And what you eat must vary from one day to another, according to the amount of work done. Do not cut down your food on the day when you have exercised more than usual. That is when you need the full supply. On this matter you will have to exercise your own judgment. In general, avoid fats, as butter, cream and cocoa; starchy foods, as breads and cereals; flesh-producing vegetables, as potatoes, beans and carrots; all pastries and sweets. Of course they are the very things which you take the most delight in eating. That is just how you have put on so much flesh. Eat plenty of fruit, except bananas and melons. Meat, if not taken in excess, poultry and fish may be added to your list. Drink water, preferably hot, between meals. Not more than one glass should ever be taken with meals. A hot lemonade before retiring is very good.—Woman's World for May.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

(Detroit Free Press.)

Capital punishment is always objectionable because it is irrevocable. Mistakes will occur as long as human institutions last, but their victims who are in prison can at least be set at liberty and some show of restitution can be made to them for the injustice they undergo. But the man who goes to the gallows or the electric chair unjustly goes beyond recall.

WHERE THE TROUBLE LIES.

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times.)

Certainly a domestic and social system that produces a young woman who at 17 and possessed of great wealth is haled into court as an incorrigible must have a wheel loose in it somewhere. When it is further said that many of the young associates of this girl, parasites and outright crooks who have been fleecing her right and left, have become alarmed and taken to cover to avoid arrest, the damning extent of the system in New York is alarmingly set forth.

It is not so much an evidence of a decay of morals, nor is it a sign of increasing waywardness among the young people of this generation, that is brought out in the deplorable facts concerning this New York girl, as it is an awful exhibition of the blighting soul-and-life-withering influence of a combination of too much money and too little intelligent, healthy employment of the consequent idle time.

Making History.

When Kinglake was writing his history of the Crimean war he received letters from all sorts of people concerned in the war. One day a letter with a deep black border came from two people in the colonies, husband and wife, describing their grief. Their only child had been killed in the Crimea. They wanted to have him mentioned in the "History of the Crimean War." Kinglake was touched and replied by post that he would do his best if they would send him the necessary particulars. Again a letter, also black bordered, full of thanks, but with the following conclusion: "We have no particulars whatever to give you. He was killed on the spot, like many others, but anything you may kindly invent will be welcome. We leave it entirely to your imagination."—London Opinion.

ZAM-BUK AND OUTDOOR LIFE.

Every tennis or ball player, every swimmer, every canoeist, every man or woman who loves outdoor life and exercise, should keep a box of Zam-Buk handy.

Zam-Buk is a purely herbal preparation, which, as soon as applied to cuts, bruises, burns, sprains, blisters, etc., sets up highly beneficial operations. First, its antiseptic properties render the wound free from all danger from blood poisoning. Next, its soothing properties relieve and ease the pain. Then its rich, herbal balms penetrate the tissue, and set up the wonderful process of healing. Barbed wire scratches, insect stings, skin diseases such as eczema, heat rashes, ringworm, babies' heat sores, chafed places, sore feet—are all quickly cured by Zam-Buk. It also eases and cures piles. All druggists and stores. Use Zam-Buk Soap also; 25c. per tablet.

Character Shown by the Nose.

"Here is an article in the paper that says a woman's character can be determined by her nose."

"Well, there may be something in that, but there's a surer way. No one can make a mistake concerning a woman's character if he will look at the noses of other women who meet her. The extent to which they turn up at such times shows just what she is or isn't."—Exchange.

A Matter of Trade.

An American merchant in Guatemala had a rich customer who wanted two dozen ties exactly like the one he wore. The order was sent to a maker in the United States, who answered that those ties were out of date, and sent two dozen of the latest style. They were not wanted. The merchant then ordered two dozen in Germany, where they were made just as desired.—New York Post.

THE MOTHER'S CHOICE.

One Five Minutes in the Life of Her Dead Soldier Son.

A mother lost her soldier son. The news came to her in despatches from the war. He had fallen fighting nobly at the head of his regiment.

She was inconsolable. "Oh, that I might see him again!" she prayed. "If only for five minutes," the angel said.

"Quick, quick!" said the mother, her tears turned to momentary joy.

"Yes," said the angel, "but think a little. He was a grown man. There are thirty years to choose from. How would you see him?"

The mother paused and wondered.

"Would you see him," said the angel, "as a soldier dying heroically at his post? Would you see him as he left you to join the transport? Would you see him as you first saw him in the uniform? Would you see him again as on that day at school when he stepped on the platform to receive the highest honors a boy could have?"

"How did you know?" the mother asked, her eyes lighting.

The angel smiled. "Would you see him as a baby at your breast? Would you?"

"No," said the mother. "I would have him for five minutes as he was one day when he ran in from the garden to ask my forgiveness for being naughty. He was so small and so unhappy, and he was very hot, and the tears were making streaks down his face through the garden dirt. And he flew into my arms with such force that he hurt me."—E. V. Lucas in "Lucas' Annual."

Oxygen Cakes.

Solid oxygen in cakes like soap, easily turned into oxygen of the gas form, is a new substitute for the tanks of compressed oxygen used in breathing apparatus for coal mine rescues, in the machines for supplying oxygen in cases of extreme sickness, and in a great many manufacturing processes. The cakes of oxygen rapidly turn into the gas when placed in contact with water, in much the same way that carbide is turned into acetylene gas. A pound cake of solid oxygen will make more than two cubic feet of the gas.—Saturday Evening Post.

BETTER THAN SPANKING

Spanking does not cure children of bed-wetting. There is a constitutional cause for this trouble. Mrs. M. Summers, Box W. 8, Windsor, Ont., will send free to any mother her successful home treatment, with full instructions. Send no money but write her to-day if your children trouble you in this way. Don't blame the child, the chances are it can't help it. This treatment also cures adults and aged people troubled with urine difficulties by day or night.

FICTION REFORM NEEDED.

(Detroit Free Press.)

It seems high time that some one said a word against that class of fiction which portrays the business man as a beast of prey, lacking scruples and honor, who regards every good-looking girl as a possible victim. Such stuff is an insult to thousands of decent men and virtuous girls; it suggests what it tacitly condemns—but sometimes condones. No man is insensitive to the charm of the pretty face, but it by no means follows that he has an evil heart. The average business man understands that a liaison with an office employe is a menace to his business and social standing and to his family relations. Most men prize and honor their homes and children. That there are exceptions we know, but they prove the rule. They get into the courts and the newspapers, but they do not reflect the general relation of employer and his female employes.

THE BEST MEDICINE FOR LITTLE ONES

Thousands of mothers say Baby's Own Tablets are the only medicine they would give their little ones. Among them is Mrs. Howard Hodgkins, St. Catharines, Ont., who says: "I am a user of Baby's Own Tablets, and think them the best medicine in the world for little ones." Once a mother has used the Tablets she will use no other medicine because she feels the Tablets are absolutely safe, and knows they never fail to banish all the simple ailments of little ones. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

BLOODTHIRSTY FERRETS.

They Kill Not for Food, but for the Mere Sake of Slaughter.

The ferret is one of the most peculiar members of the animal kingdom. It belongs also to an extraordinary family, that of the weasels. A branch of this family is called the polecats, the European representative of our skunks, and the ferret is a species of polecat, generally an albino, yellowish-white in color, with pink eyes.

To hunt and kill mice, rats, rabbits and other small animals is the ferret's delight. It is coldly methodical in its murderous pursuits, and, while it serves its master well, never tiring in the chase and never shrinking from man attack, it exhibits no trace of affection or attachment toward its trainers, as nobler animals do. The ferret is a typical killer and blood shedder. It has no friends and apparently wants none. It cannot be trusted and will sometimes attack small children.

It likes to kill not for the sake of food, but for the sake of killing. The mere act of taking the life of another creature is a pleasure to it. How it got this bloodthirsty strain in its nature no one can tell. Its appetite for slaughter serves well in ridding our houses of rats and mice, but of what use is it to the ferret to kill those creatures? Its nature is that of a demon, and wherever it sees the life blood beating at a throat its brutal instinct urges it to slit the throat with its keen teeth and let the life throb out!—New York Journal.

At the Yarmouth Y.M.C.A. Boys' Camp, held at Tusket Falls in August, I found MINARD'S LINIMENT most beneficial for sun burn, an immediate relief for colic and toothache.

ALFRED STOKES,
General Secretary.

THE ENGINEER KNOWS.

(London Advertiser.)

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, representing both the Canadian and American wings of the great order, have passed an unanimous resolution for provincial and state and national prohibition. No set of the men knows the dangers of the bottle more clearly than the engineers. Your engineer is usually about the manliest type in the community. He takes care of your life constantly, and he knows that liquor is as much a menace to humanity as a misplaced switch or a broken rail or a tie placed on the track by desperadoes.

A LIBERAL WEST.

The resignation en masse of the Roblin Tory Government makes one more Province added to the Liberal banner. British Columbia is now the only Tory Government west of the Great Lakes, and it may come tumbling to the ground any day, thus making a solid West for the Liberal party. Looking East we find the Liberals buoyed up by the hope and expectation that down by the sea there will be a revolution that will drive the Tories from power. Ex-Premier Flemming of New Brunswick was kicked out of office, and can no longer face a provincial electorate. In Nova Scotia, young Mr. Foster's horse deals have struck a blow at the party that will be found to tell against it. East and West the Conservatives are on the run, and whether they hold an election now, or wait for a more convenient season, we believe that their doom is sealed.

BRITAIN'S NEW GOVERNMENT

The new coalition Government organized under Premier Asquith has created little enthusiasm in Great Britain. The Liberals are lukewarm in regard to it, and the Tories appear to take it as a matter of course. Coalition Governments are seldom popular with the people, and as seldom are they long lived or successful. There was nothing much the matter with the former Cabinet, nothing that could not have been patched up. But the Tory newspaper attacks on Lord Kitchener and Mr. Churchill became so continuous and bitter that Mr. Asquith, no doubt, felt that something should be done to offset this evil. Perhaps the most significant and important appointment in the whole list is that of Lloyd George from the Exchequer Chancellorship to be Minister of Munitions. Next to the Premier, Mr. Lloyd-George stands prominently in popular favor. His marvellous work in handling the finances of the country on the eve of the war and since, and the ginger he has put into the war preparations, have marked him out as no ordinary man. From being the most hated man in certain circles in Britain, he has become the most highly rated. As Minister of Munitions he will be in a position to give Gen. French all the shells and high explosives he may need. We hope he will not forget the gas. Mr. Lloyd-George will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Henderson, the Labor member in the Cabinet, in organizing the labor forces in connection with the war.

Lord Kitchener, the man with no politics, stays as Minister of War, the campaign of abuse engineered by Lord Northcliffe against him failing. Mr. Churchill has been dethroned from the Admiralty, accepting a mere sinecure instead, that of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This is quite a drop, and some might think that he would have dropped out altogether rather than accept it. But the public do not yet know the real cause of the Cabinet shuffle. He may have good reasons for staying. Mr. Arthur J. Balfour, the former Unionist leader, succeeds him as First Lord of the Admiralty. For some months back Mr. Balfour has been associated in an advisory way with the Admiralty, and may have special qualifications for the position of which the public is not aware. To our mind he is not a man of much force of character, although he is in many ways singularly able. There is a possibility that his appointment may lead to the resignation of Lord Fisher from the Admiralty Board.

Andrew Bonar Law, the leader of the Tory Opposition in the Commons, has been appointed Secretary for the Colonies. This is a position, the possession of which must be extremely gratifying to Mr. Law, he being a Canadian, in other words a colonial. When Sir Edward Carson has been pitchforked into the Cabinet as Attorney-General we would have liked to see Mr. John Redmond also among the Ministers. The Cabinet is composed of twelve Liberals, eight Conservatives, one Laborite and one of no political affiliation. This will be known as a War Ministry, whose whole or principal business will be the prosecution of the war with all the force and resources of the Empire. In this work we wish it every success.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Lord Northcliffe might be invited to man the trenches.

* * *

Kitchener's work is a complete answer to his detractors.

* * *

The sinking of the Lusitania sank all Dr. Dernburg's hopes in America.

* * *

Prince Von Buelow and Dr. Dernburg have both failed in their missions.

* * *

For giving comfort to the enemy Lord Northcliffe should be stripped of his title.

* * *

Conscription might be preferable to some of the means employed to force men to the front.

* * *

We might expect that Germany would put up a big fight. She has been training for forty years for this fight.

* * *

It is suggested that the women of Saskatchewan will receive the vote at an early date. The Scott Government believes that in this way it can get Prohibition for the whole province.

* * *

Mrs. Pankhurst is showing a good example to the other political parties. She says: "In the face of the peril which confronts the country it is no time to think of causes espoused in the past."

* * *

The new British Government proposes to tighten up the press censorship. What will Lord Northcliffe say to that? His Times has been protesting ever since the war began about the censorship.

* * *

A Buffalo exchange says that it is well to keep in mind the fact that last year Canada bought from the United States more than all the other countries of the new world combined. It gives the figures thus. Our exports to Canada were $345,000,000, to Cuba, $[illegible],000,000; to Argentina, $45,000,000; to Mexico, $29,000,000; to Brazil, $39,000,000, to Panama, $21,000,000, to Chile, $17,000,000."

* * *

There is no conscription in Great Britain, but the young man who shirks when he should be at the front is meeting with many reminders of his duty. In London from now until the end of the war only men ineligible for military service will be employed on the municipal tramways, and no candidate for admission to the clergy will be ordained who are physically fit for duty in the ranks.

* * *

The Buffalo News regrets to learn that there is a move to have United States and other foreign labor put off the Welland ship canal work. In the same issue it says: "An interesting feature of war preparation is announced from Pennsgrove, N. J. All the foreigners employed at the Dupont powder works at that place have been dismissed from service, and the guard has been more than redoubled." As there are lots of Canadians working in the States, we see no reason why the Americans should be denied work in Canada.

* * *

Mr. Grahame, a New Yorker who has been in England for some months and in touch with the British War Office, says that "It is said in England that not one of Kitchener's expeditionary force of 2,000,000 men, called at the beginning of the war, has yet been sent out of England. Recruits are being sent continually to reinforce the British army already in the field, but Kitchener's volunteer army is being held in reserve." The blow will come later on, when Germany shows signs of exhaustion, is the belief.

* * *

Since the war, trade with Canada has presented new openings to New Zealand not heretofore recognized. A growing imperial sentiment is chiefly responsible for the changed viewpoint. Up to the present, when suggesting to an importer the desirability of purchasing Canadian goods, the reply has often been, "they can be purchased more cheaply from Germany or Austria," and in addition to this, the goods could be shipped from Germany via London at a lower freight rate than from Canada direct. These have been two of the chief impediments to Canadian trade. The war, however, has to a great extent changed this condition of affairs, and prominent importers of New Zealand have stated that they will in future purchase within the Empire, even at a higher price.

Could Not Bend Down On Account of Backache.

Mr. J. A. Lubiniecki, Dauphin, Man., writes: "It is my pleasure to write you in regard to Doan's Kidney Pills which I have been using for some time for kidney trouble, which used to affect my back so that at times I could not bend down, nor could I walk straight. I learned about your pills from your Almanac, and I bless the happy hour I thought of buying this medicine. One time a druggist persuaded me to buy ——— Kidney Pills, saying they were just as good, in fact he guaranteed they were. I yielded to his advice, and what was the result? I had betting down pains in my back for two days, so I took the balance of the pills unused to the druggist, and told him to give me Doan's Kidney Pills as they would stop the pain in 12 hours at the outside. He told me he was sorry I did not use more of the pills, and lengthen the time to await results. I told him there is no need of waiting with Doan's Pills, they go right to the spot. No substitute for me."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c a box, 3 boxes for $1.25 at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

Many Troubles Arise From Wrong Action Of The Liver.

Unless the liver is working properly you may look forward to a great many troubles arising such as biliousness, constipation, heartburn, the rising and souring of food which leaves a nasty taste in the mouth, sick headache, jaundice, etc.

Mr. Howard Newcomb, Pleasant Harbor, N.S., writes: "I have had sick headache, been bilious, and have had pains after eating and was also troubled with a bad taste in my mouth every morning. I used four vials of your Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills, and they cured me. The best praise I can give is not enough for them."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills are 25c. per vial, 5 vials for $1.00; at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

THE Changeling

Thus the winter passed away, and early in the spring George Douglas, to whom Madam Conway had long ago sent a favorable answer, came to visit his betrothed, bringing to Maggie a note from Rose, who had once or twice sent messages in Henry's letters. She was in Worcester now, and her health was very delicate. "Sometimes," she wrote, "I fear that I shall never see you, Maggie Miller—shall never look into your beautiful face, or listen to your voice; but whether in heaven or on earth I am first to meet with you, my heart claims you as a sister—the one whom of all the sisters in the world I would rather call my own."

"Darling Rose!" murmured Maggie, pressing the delicately traced lines to her lips, "how near she seems to me! nearer almost than Theo." And then involuntarily her thoughts went backward to the night when Henry Warner first told her of his love, and when in her dreams there had been a strange blending together of herself, of Rose and the little grave beneath the pine!

But not yet was that veil of mystery to be lifted. Hagar's secret must be kept a little longer, and, unsuspicious of the truth, Maggie Miller could dream on of sweet Rose Warner, whom she hopes one day to call her sister!

There was also a message from Henry, and this George Douglas delivered in secret, for he did not care to displease his grandmother-elect, who, viewing him through a golden setting, thought he was not to be equalled by any one in America. "So gentlemanly," she said, "and so modest, too," basing her last conclusion upon his evident unwillingness to say very much of himself or his family. Concerning the latter she had questioned him in vain, eliciting nothing save the fact that they lived in the country several miles from Worcester, that his father always stayed at home, and consequently his mother went but little into society.

"Despises the vulgar herd, I dare say," thought Madam Conway, contemplating the pleasure she should undoubtedly derive from the acquaintance of Mrs. Douglas, senior.

"There was a sister, too," he said, and at this announcement Theo opened wide her blue eyes, asking her name, and "why he had never mentioned her before."

"I call her Jenny," said he, coloring slightly, and adding playfully, as he caressed Theo's smooth, round cheek, "wives do not usually like their husband's sisters."

"But I shall like her, I know," said Theo. "She has a beautiful name—Jennie Douglas—much prettier than Rose Warner, about whom Maggie talks to me so much."

A gathering frown on her grandmother's face warned Theo that she had touched upon a forbidden subject, and as Mr. Douglas manifested no desire to continue the conversation, it ceased for a time, Theo wishing she "could see Jenny Douglas," and George wondering what she would say when she did see her!

For a few days longer he lingered, and ere his return it was arranged that early in July Theo should be his bride. On the morning of his departure, as he stood upon the steps alone with Madam Conway, she said: "I think I can rely upon you, Mr. Douglas, not to carry either letter, note or message from Maggie to that young Warner. I've forbidden him my house, and I mean what I say."

"I assure you, madam, she has not asked me to carry either," answered George; who, though he knew perfectly well of the secret correspondence, had kept it to himself. "You mistake Mr. Warner, I think," he continued, after a moment. "I have known him long, and esteem him highly."

"Tastes differ," returned Madam Conway, coldly. "No man of good breeding would presume to cut up my grandfather's coat, or drink up my best wine."

"He intended no disrespect, I am sure," answered George. "He only wanted a little fun with the stars and stripes."

"It was fun for which he will pay most dearly, though," answered Madam Conway, as she bade Mr. Douglas good-by; then, walking back to the parlor, she continued, speaking to herself: "Stars and stripes! I'll teach him to cut up my blue bodice for fun! I wouldn't give him Margaret if his life depended upon it," and sitting down, she wrote to Arthur Carrollton, asking if he really intended visiting America, and when.

CHAPTER XIII.

During the remainder of the spring matters at the old stone house proceeded about as usual, Maggie writing regularly to Henry, who as regularly answered, while old Hagar managed so adroitly that no one suspected the secret correspondence, and Madam Conway began to hope her granddaughter had forgotten the foolish fancy. Arthur Carrollton had replied that his visit to America, though sure to take place, was postponed indefinitely, and so the good lady had nothing in particular with which to busy herself, save the preparations for Theo's wedding, which was to take place near the first of July.

Though setting a high value upon money, Madam Conway was not penurious, and the bridal trousseau far exceeded anything which Theo had expected. As the young couple were not to keep house for a time, a most elegant suit of rooms had been selected in a fashionable hotel; and, determining that Theo should not, in point of dress, be rivaled by any of her fellow-boarders, Madam Conway spared neither time nor money in making the outfit perfect. So, for weeks the old stone house presented a scene of great confusion. Chairs, tables, lounges and piano were piled with finery, on which Anna Jeffrey worked industriously, assisted sometimes by her aunt, whom Madam Conway pronounced altogether too superannuated for a governess, and who, though really an excellent scholar, was herself far better pleased with muslin robes and satin bows than with French idioms and Latin verbs. Perfectly delighted, Mag joined in the general excitement, wondering occasionally when and where her own bridal would be. Once she ventured to ask if Henry Warner and his sister might be invited to Theo's wedding; but Madam Conway answered so decidedly in the negative that she gave it up, consoling herself with thinking that she would some time visit his sister and see Henry, in spite of her grandmother.

The marriage was very quiet, for Madam Conway had no acquaintance, and the family alone witnessed the ceremony. At first Madam Conway had hoped that Mr. and Mrs. Douglas, senior, together with their daughter Jenny, would be present, and she had accordingly requested George to invite them, feeling greatly disappointed when she learned that they could not come.

"I wanted so much to see them," she said to Mag, "and know whether they are worthy to be related to the Conways. But of course they are as much so as any American family. George has every appearance of refinement and high breeding."

"But his family, for all that, may be as ignorant as Farmer Canfield's," answered Mag; to which her grandmother replied: "You needn't tell me that, for I'm not to be deceived in such matters. I can tell at a glance if a person is low born, no matter what their education or advantages may have been. Who's that?" she added quickly, and, turning around, she saw old Hagar, her eyes lighted up and her lips moving with an incoherent sound not easily understood.

Hagar had come up to the wedding, and had reached the door of Madam Conway's room just in time to hear the last remark, which roused her at once.

"Why don't she discover my secret, then," she muttered, "if she has so much discernment? Why don't she see the Hagar blood in her? for it's there, plain as day," and she glanced proudly at Mag, who, in her simple robe of white, was far more beautiful than the bride.

And still Theo, in her handsome traveling dress, was fair to look upon, and George Douglas felt proud that she was his, resolving, as he kissed away the tears she shed at parting, that the vow he had just made should never be broken. A few weeks of pleasant travel ensued, and then the newly-wedded pair came back to what, for a time, was to be their home.

George Douglas was highly respected in Worcester, both as a man of honor and a man of wealth; consequently every possible attention was paid to Theo, who was petted and admired until she began to wonder why neither Mag, nor yet her all-discerning grandmother, had discovered how charming and faultless she was.

Among George's acquaintance was a Mrs. Morton, a dashing, fashionable woman, who determined to honor the bride with a party, to which all the elite of Worcester were invited, together with many of the Bostonians. Madam Conway and Mag were, of course, upon the list, and as timely notice was given them by Theo, Madam Conway went twice to Springfield in quest of a suitable dress for Mag. "She wanted something becoming," she said, and a delicate rose-colored satin with a handsome overskirt of lace, was at last decided upon.

"She must have some pearls for her hair," thought Madam Conway, and when next Maggie, who, girl-like, tried the effect of her first party dress at least a dozen times, stood before the glass to see "if it were exactly the right length," she was presented with the pearls, which Anna Jeffrey, with a feeling of envy at her heart, arranged in the shining braids of her hair.

"Oh, isn't it perfectly splendid!" cried Mag, herself half inclined to compliment the beautiful image reflected in the mirror.

"You ought to see Arthur Carrollton's sister when she is dressed, if you think you look handsome," answered Anna, adding that "diamonds were much more fashionable than pearls."

"You have attended a great many parties and seen a great deal of fashion, and I dare say you are right," Mag answered, ironically; and then, as through the open window she saw Hagar approaching, she ran out upon the piazza to see what the old woman would say.

Hagar had never seen her thus before, and now, throwing up her hands in astonishment, she involuntarily dropped upon her knees, and while the tears rained over her time-worn face, whispered: "Hester's child — my granddaughter! Heaven be praised!"

"Do I look pretty?" Margaret asked, and Hagar answered: "More beautiful than any one I ever saw. I wish your mother could see you now."

Involuntarily Maggie glanced at the tall marble gleaming through the distant trees, while Hagar's thoughts were down in that other grave — the grave beneath the pine. The next day was the party, and at an early hour Madam Conway was ready. Her rich purple satin and Valenciennes laces, with which she hoped to impress Mrs. Douglas, senior, were carefully packed up together with Maggie's dress; and then, shawled and bonneted, she waited impatiently for her carriage, which she preferred to the cars. It came at last, but in place of John, the usual coachman, Mike, a rather wild youth of twenty, was mounted upon the box. His father, he said, had been taken suddenly ill, and had deputed him to drive.

For a time Madam Conway hesitated, for she knew Mike's old great failing, and she hardly dared risk herself with him, lest she should find a seat less desirable even than the memorable brush-heap. But Mike protested loudly to having joined the "Sons of Temperance" only the night before, and, as in his new suit of blue, with shining brass buttons, he presented a more stylish appearance than his father, his mistress finally decided to try him, threatening all manner of evil if, in any way, he broke his pledge, either to herself or the "Sons," the latter of whom had probably never heard of him. He was perfectly sober now, and drove them safely to Worcester, where they soon found themselves resting in Theo's handsome rooms. Her wrappings removed and herself snugly ensconced in a velvet-cushioned chair, Madam Conway asked: "How long before Mrs. Douglas, senior, would probably arrive?"

A slight shadow, which no one observed, passed over Theo's face as she answered: "George's father seldom goes into society, and consequently his mother will not come."

"Oh, I am so sorry," replied Madam Conway, thinking of the purple satin, and continuing, "Nor the young lady, either?"

"None of them," answered Theo; adding hastily, as if to change the conversation, "Isn't my piano perfectly elegant?" and she ran her fingers over an exquisitely carved instrument which had inscribed upon it simply "Theo"; and then, as young brides sometimes will, she expatiated upon the kindness and generosity of George, showing, withal, that her love for her husband was founded upon something far more substantial than family or wealth.

Her own happiness, it would seem, had rendered her less selfish and more thoughtful for others; for once that afternoon, on returning to her room after a brief absence, she whispered to Mag that "some one in the parlor below wished to see her."

Then, seating herself at her grandmother's feet, she entertained her so well with a description of her travels that the good lady failed to observe the absence of Mag, who face to face with Henry Warner, was making amends for their long separation. Much they talked of the past, and then Henry spoke of the future; but of this Mag was less hopeful. Her grandmother would never consent to their marriage, she knew—the stars and stripes had decided that matter, even though there were no Arthur Carrollton across the sea; and Mag sighed despondingly as she thought of the long years of single-blessedness in store for her.

"There is but one alternative left, then," said Henry, "if your grandmother refuses her consent altogether, I must take you without her consent."

"I shan't run away," said Mag. "I shall live an old maid, and you must live an old bachelor, until grandma—"

She did not have time to finish the sentence ere Henry commenced unfolding the following plan:

It was necessary, he said, for either him or Mr. Douglas to go to Cuba; and as Rose's health made a change of climate advisable for her, George had proposed to him to go, and take his sister there for the winter. "And, Maggie," he continued, "will you go, too? We are to sail the middle of October, stopping for a few weeks in Florida, until the unhealthy season in Havana is passed. I will see your grandmother to-morrow morning—will once more honorably ask her for your hand, and if she still refuses, as you think she will, it cannot surely be wrong in you to consult your own happiness instead of her prejudices. I will meet you at old Hagar's cabin at the time appointed. Rose and my aunt, who is to accompany her, will be in New York, whither we will go immediately. A few moments more and you will be my wife, and beyond the control of your grandmother. Do you approve my plan, Maggie, darling? Will you go?"

Maggie could not answer him then, for an elopement was something from which she instinctively shrank, and with a faint hope that her grandmother might consent, she went back to her sister's room, where she had not yet been missed. Very rapidly the remainder of the afternoon passed away, and at an early hour, wishing to know "exactly how she was going to look," Mag commenced her toilet. Theo, too, desirous of displaying her white satin as long as possible, began to dress; while Madam Conway, in no haste to don her purple satin, which was uncomfortably tight, amused herself by watching the passers by, nodding at intervals in her chair.

While thus occupied a perfumed note was brought to her, the contents of which elicited from her an exclamation of surprise.

"Can it be possible!" she said; and, thrusting the note into her pocket, she hastily left the room.

She was gone a long, long time; and when at last she returned she was evidently much excited, paying no attention whatever to Theo, who, dressed in her bridal robes, looked [illegible], but minutely inspecting Mag to see if in her adornings there was aught out of place. Her dress was faultless, and she looked so radiantly beautiful as she stood before her grandmother that the old lady kissed her fondly, whispering as she did so, "You are indeed beautiful." It was a long time ere Madam Conway commenced her own toilet, and then she proceeded so slowly that George Douglas became impatient, and she finally suggested that he and Theo should go without her, sending the carriage back for herself and Mag. To this proposition she at last yielded, and when they were left alone Madam Conway greatly accelerated her movements, dressing herself in a few moments; and then, much to Mag's surprise, going below without a word of explanation. A few moments only elapsed ere a servant was sent to Mag, saying that her presence was desired at No. 40, a small private parlor adjoining the public drawing-room.

"What can it mean? Is it possible that Henry is there?" Mag asked herself, as with a beating heart she descended the stairs.

A moment more, and Mag stood on the threshold of No. 40. Seated upon the sofa was Madam Conway, her purple satin seeming to have taken a wide sweep, and her face betokening the immense degree of satisfaction she felt in being there thus with the stylish, elegant-looking stranger who stood at her side, with his deep, expressive eyes fixed upon the door expectantly. Maggie knew him in a moment—knew it was Arthur Carrollton; and, turning pale, she started backward, while he advanced forward and, offering her his hand, looked down upon her with a winning smile, saying as he did so: "Excuse my familiarity. You are Maggie Miller, I am sure."

For an instant Mag could not reply, but, soon recovering her composure, she received the stranger gracefully, and then, taking the chair he politely brought her, she listened while her grandmother told her that he had arrived at Montreal two weeks before, that he had reached Hillsdale that morning, and learning their destination had followed them in the cars; that she had taken the liberty of informing Mrs. Morton of his arrival, and that lady had, of course, extended to him an invitation to be present at the party.

"Which invitation I accept, provided Miss Maggie allows me to be her escort," said the young man, and again his large, black eyes rested upon her admiringly.

Mag had anticipated a long, quiet talk with Henry Warner, and, wishing the Englishman anywhere else but there, she answered coldly: "I cannot well decline your escort, Mr. Carrollton, so of course I accept it."

Madam Conway bit her lip, but Mr. Carrollton, who was prepared for anything from Maggie Miller, was not in the least displeased, and, consulting his diamond-set watch, which pointed to nearly ten, he asked if it were not time to go.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson XI. June 13, 1915.

The Blessedness of Forgiveness.—Psalm 32: 1-11.

Commentary.—I. The joy of pardon (vs. 1, 2). 1. Blessed is he—The original is expressive, "Oh, the blessedness." This blessedness David had experienced upon obtaining forgiveness, and only those who have felt the joy of pardon can understand what he here says. Transgression—The violation of the law or the rights of others. Transgression means a going across or beyond proper boundaries. This is one of the terms used to designate sin. Forgiven—A full, instantaneous, irreversible pardon of transgression turns the poor sinner's hell into heaven, and makes the heir of wrath a partaker in blessing. The word rendered "forgiven" is in the original "taken off," or "taken away," as a burden is lifted or a barrier removed.—Spurgeon. Sin—This word means a missing of the mark or a coming short. It indicates a failure to meet God's requirements. Covered—This word is the same in its derivation as that which is translated "atonement." The precious blood of Christ covers the sins of the believer. Sin is something defiling, hideous, and through God's mercy it is covered so that he does not see it or remember it against the pardoned sinner any more forever. 2. The Lord imputeth not iniquity—The Lord does not charge with sin any more those whom he has pardoned. They were guilty, but their sins are borne away, are covered and are no longer written down against them. "The words thus rendered [transgression, sin, iniquity] describe sin in different aspects, (1) as rebellion, or breaking away from God; (2) as wandering from the way, or missing the mark; (3) as depravity, or moral distortion. Forgiveness is also triply described, (1) as the taking away of a burden; (2) as covering, so that the foulness of sin no longer meets the eye of the judge and calls for punishment; (3) as the cancelling of a debt, which is no longer reckoned against the offender."—Cam. Bib. In whose spirit there is no guile—There can be no forgiveness as long as there is a disposition to deceive one's self or the Lord. Sincerity is one of the primary conditions of pardon.

II. The pain of sin concealed (vs. 3, 4). 3. When I kept silence—David had kept his terrible sins of adultery and murder as much to himself as possible for a year. Bath-sheba knew all and Joab knew about the death of Uriah. His sin was covered up from public gaze, but it was not hidden from himself nor from God. My bones waxed old—David's suffering from the pangs of conscience were intense. His trouble affected his physical health, so that his strength was giving way. Through my roaring all the day long—His groaning consisted of moans and other signs of grief that found no expression in words. It was through the mercy of God that he could find no rest from his guilty conscience. He gave no signs of confession, but he gave oft-repeated expression to his sorrow and pain. 4. Thy hand was heavy upon me—God's hand upon his submissive, trusting child is an uplifting, comforting hand. It affords strength and courage for life's labors and pains. It is a protecting, providing hand. To David in his guilt it was a heavy hand, giving him unrest and sorrow unmixed with comfort. My moisture is turned into the drought of summer. A burning, feverish condition of the body existed or a burning desolation of soul. The drought of summer in Palestine is almost like desolation itself. The hills and valleys that in spring are beautifully clad with verdure are parched and barren in summer except where there is a supply of water. Selah—This expression indicates a rest in the music and a change in the thought.

III. Relief in confession (vs. 5-7). 5. I acknowledge my sin unto thee—Nathan, the prophet, was God's messenger to David, and he was led to confess the sins he had long kept buried in his own heart. The burden became so heavy, conviction became so deep, that he made his acknowledgment of guilt. He no longer tried to deceive himself or others. Mine iniquity have I not hid—In this verse the psalmist uses the same words for sin that he did in the first two verses of the psalm. He disclosed his meanness, his selfishness, his injustice. I said, I will confess—Under the continual goadings of his conscience he came to the point where he decided to make his confession and he carried out his determination. Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin—David declared with emphasis that it was the Lord that granted forgiveness. There appears here no intervention of priest. David came directly to the Lord with his broken contrite heart, and he became at once assured that his sins were forgiven. 6. For this—Because David had received a signal victory and found immediate and complete relief from his burden of guilt, therefore all should be encouraged to come to God in sincerity and faith for needed help. In a time when thou mayest be found—It is plainly implied that the thing will come when effective prayer will be impossible. This is a solemn warning not to put off the time of our seeking the Lord. In the floods of great waters—David had such confidence in God from his experience in answered prayer, that he was convinced that he would sustain his trusting children in the midst of the severest tests in life. 7. Thou art my hiding place—A marvelous change had come to David. He had been hiding from God, and his physical strength was giving away under the strain of deep conviction and his attempt to cover up his sin, but with the relief that had come to him from his burden's being lifted, he felt that he had in God a hiding-place, a place of refuge. Thou shalt preserve me from trouble—Trouble shall do me no real harm when the Lord is with me, rather it shall bring me much benefit, like the file which clears away the rust, but does not destroy the metal.—Spurgeon. Thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance—Just a little while before this he was "roaring all the day long" because of his awful burden of guilt, now he was surrounded on all sides with the music of victory.

IV. Instruction (vs. 8-11). 8. I will instruct thee—The Lord is here speaking. He becomes the instructor of all those who choose to follow him. I will counsel thee with mine eye upon thee (R. V.)—There is a close intimacy between the Lord and those who belong to Him. He notes every movement and with His eye directs them. 9. Be ye not as the horse—The animals here mentioned must be controlled by force. The children of God keep their eyes and ears open to know the course He would have them take. Else they will not come near unto thee (R.V.). The horse or the mule need the bit of the bridle upon them that the master may control them. Otherwise they would be likely to run away beyond his reach. 10. Many sorrows shall be to the wicked—In the last two verses the psalmist contrasts the condition of the wicked to that of the righteous. He had experienced some of the sorrows of the wicked. Mercy shall compass him about—He may meet the distresses incident to human life, but he is so protected by the mercy of the Lord that he is not greatly affected by them. 11. Be glad in the Lord—The genuine Christian has joy in the Lord. —Shout for joy ... upright in heart—Not only are the saints permitted to shout the praises of God, but they are directly exhorted to do so. David's "roaring" had evidently been changed into shouting.

Questions.—By whom was this psalm written? At what time and under what circumstances? Who are pronounced blessed? What three words are used to express forgiveness? Why was David in deep distress of soul and body? How did he find relief? How does he show his trust in God? What contrast is drawn between the righteous and the wicked?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Doctrine and experience.
I. A penitent sinner forgiven.
II. A teacher to the penitent.

I. A penitent sinner forgiven. This psalm is a grateful rehearsal of the blessedness of divine forgiveness, illustrated from David's personal experience. It is doctrine explaining facts while facts enforce the doctrine. It tells of sin committed, concealed, rankling within, confessed and put away. David declared how God met the necessity of his case by removing guilt and renovating character. The fact and the consciousness of forgiveness brought comfort to his soul. Man the sinner and God the Saviour are the great themes of this psalm. Under painful consciousness of his guilt, David had lived under a constant depression, bearing a secret, silent burden, a rebel of perverse inclination, self willed and spiritually deformed, in revolt missing the mark, his life marred by crookedness and deformity. Such was the wretchedness which his sin and silence concerning it entailed upon him. His weird picture is a realistic illustration of the misery of the unrepentant. The absence of inward peace, hitherto possessed, deprived David of that element which sweetened life's sorrow and smoothed its roughness. He had gloom, unrest and a dread of ill. He was robbed of his trust in God until he recognized the radical nature of sin. Then he had a whole catalogue of joyful consequences following his confession. From an abject penitent, moaning day and night under God's heavy hand, David was transformed into a joyful singer of God's goodness, declaring the blessedness of deliverance from remorse and the dreadful pangs of an accusing conscience to a close clinging to God in perfect trust. David proclaimed the mastery and removal of his sin by God's grace, the emancipation from a crushing load, the interment of the evil thing with his wickedness no longer chargeable to him. An accusing conscience was exchanged for the peace of God, his agonizing silence to inexpressible song. He exulted in the blessedness which his forgiveness had secured of him. His words were a burst of thankful rapture. The change in himself was real, the transition marvelous. It was to him a real change from darkness to light.

II. A teacher to the impenitent. David revealed the path which led to divine forgiveness. He made open confession of his sin and ceased from excuses and palliations. His confession was minute and unreserved. His conscious sense of sin was accompanied with self-abasement, self-condemnation, self-abhorrence. He defined wickedness as the absence of a trust in God, leaving the soul exposed to all that is depraved and vicious, with no defence or safeguard, no motive to animate to duty or to warn from iniquity. All sin he counted as a departure from God and that formed its deepest and largest characteristic. He termed it the source of all corruption and trouble, declaring that it dissolves the union and communion of the soul with God and leads to apostasy. It is manifest in a divergence from the straight line of righteousness into paths that are wrong. David's comfort was not found in his penitence, but in the promises of God. His confession was the breaking down of the barrier raised by impenitence and unbelief. When sin was comprehended in all its evil, God the Redeemer became its cure. It is the work of God in the government of the world to repair the evil which sin has wrought. Sin in its outward aspect was not changed, but to David's soul its spiritual relations was reversed. Out of his past and present experience David counselled others that they should not refuse submission until they were chastened into it. His own experience taught him to be pitiful. His testimony bore counsel and warning. His sinful silence had wrought injury to his soul, had wronged others and offended the goodness of God. Forgiveness had put away the wrath of God, the curse of the law and the fear of death. In God he found a perpetual protector and friend. Peace, freedom and courage were natural blessings coming from divine guidance. The enjoyment of fellowship combined with instruction is the promise to those who will be guided by God's eye, a promise rich with encouragement and consolation. Those who learn the language of the eye will master the language of the soul. T. R. A.

MANNERS AND BUSINESS.

(Chicago Tribune.)

There has been a veritable rediscovery of manners of business. Efficiency is being separated from brusque discourtesy. Statisticians to the contrary notwithstanding, a million "Thank yous" will not "waste" a single second. Manners may take time, but they bring money instead of taking it. Politeness and affability pay—and pay on trains and cars as in dry goods stores and restaurants. Public utilities need not be places of public exhibitions of vulgarity and rudeness. The negligent and careless employe is a menace; the rude and insolent one a nuisance. All nuisances are bad for business. The time is ripe for schools of manners and courtesy meetings in the so-called hard and practical world.

"Fruit-a-tives" are the only pill manufactured, to my way of thinking. They work completely, no griping whatever, and one is plenty for any ordinary person at a dose. My wife was a martyr to Constipation. We tried everything on the calendar without satisfaction, and spent large sums of money until we happened on "Fruit-a-tives". I cannot say too much in their favor.

We have used them in the family for about two years and we would not use anything else as long as we can get "Fruit-a-tives".

Their action is mild, and no distress at all. I have recommended them to many other people, and our whole family uses them".

That covers the ground to a nicety.

Train Wreck.

Mr. John Ropp of the South Line, Brant, motored through town yesterday on his way to Stratford to see his brother, Henry Ropp, who is in the Stratford Hospital suffering from injuries received in a train wreck which took place on the Grand Trunk, near London on Monday. Mr. Ropp had his jawbone, shoulder blade and one leg fractured in the wreck. Eighteen others were also seriously injured. Mr. Ropp is a traveller for a Hanover furniture factory, and is well known here.—Mildmay Gazette.

Out Of Doors.

The woods and the country lanes are full of new life, bursting buds are developing into leaf and blossoms, the birds are trilling a joyous roundelays and all nature combines in an invitation to come and see. He who fails to take his share of joy of the country at this time of year misses one of the best gifts that nature has to bestow. He also misses the chance of gaining that vigor of mind and body which comes only from breathing the ozone of the country air. Virile young Canada loves the out of door. Let us see to it that we loose none of the delights which our favored climate can give.

No Fair in Wellington.

The directors of the Guelph and South Wellington Agricultural Society will not hold a fall fair this year owing to the war. It was felt that the call on the public for funds for patriotic relief and other emergent purposes were so heavy, and that the money necessary to carry on a successful show would be better devoted to these purposes for this year, and a motion to that effect was carried unanimously. The directors will enter upon the work with renewed energy next year. The Directors of the Northern Exhibition have not yet decided whether they will follow the course of the Wellington Directors or not Put in Lockup.

Tommy Davison, a cripple with one leg and one arm, who said he hailed from Palmerston, spent a day in the lockup here last week as a result of begging and imbibing too free of the stuff that inebriates. He was hustled out of town by the local constable. Cripples and tramps have passed the hat quite a good deal lately and got away with it too, but a long-suffering public object to buying booze for every unfortunate duffer that comes along. If Tommy would stick to selling pencils and get on the water wagon he would do a flourishing trade.—Hanover Post. Davison is the cripple who was ordered out of town by Chief Ferguson about two weeks ago for accosting passersby and being noisy.

Beware of Ointment for Catarrh that Contain Mercury

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Engagement Announced.

The engagement is announced of Miss Sadie second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Schmidt to Mr. David Weber of Mildmay. The marriage will take place on June 15th.

The Cheapest Way.

A newspaper of average circulation visits more people in one day than a single canvasser could cover in a long time. Or again suppose you had to send letters to the same number of people you reach by one newspaper advertisement, think what it would cost. Newspaper advertising is the least expensive and most productive of all forms of advertising. It pays the manufacturer, the farmer and the merchant better than any other medium. And the local paper, in proportion to its circulation, is the most profitable newspaper in which to advertise. It is read by everybody in the home.

Address to Robert Irwin.

(Ripley Express.)

The following is the address presented to Robert Irwin by Ripley citizens on Tuesday evening of last week: To Robert Irwin, on the eve of his departure from Ripley to reside in Walkerton, Ont. Dear Fellow townsman:— On this, the eve of your departure and that of your family from our midst we, the citizens of Ripley, where you have resided for the past fifteen years, desire to express to you and yours our regret at your departure, our good-will and to assure you of the esteem in which you have been held as a citizen of our thrifty burg. It is neither easy nor painless to sever ties that have been cemented through the years of co-operation in civic and business affairs and the enjoyment of social relationships of life. To do this in any public way only increases the burden and intensifies the pain, yet we would be unworthy of the friendships of the years if we permitted you to leave our midst without some tangible expression of our feelings towards you. We wish to put it on record that your readiness to assist in anything for the advancement of our village has been cordially recognized. You have, at all times, been one of the first to render financial aid for the furtherance of any community interest or the encouraging of any less fortunate one along the highway of life. In this connection we shall miss you in the days to come, but the kindly memories will be the dearer because of this. As a slight token of the esteem and affection in which your fellow-citizens hold you, we beg you to accept of the accompanying chairs for yourself and wife, and in so doing we wish you and yours years of happiness and prosperity and the deep joys of true friendships in your new place of residence. Signed on behalf of the citizens of Ripley this 25th day of May, 1915.

COUNTY COUNCIL.

The estimate for the county of Bruce for 1915 is $167,653.08.

R. S. Nesbitt is a fine type of full blooded young manhood. He comes from Brant.

Mr. Norman Robertson the veteran treasurer of Bruce is looking younger than ever.

"Black" Dan McDonald, of Kinloss, is the quiet little joker of the council and is also an ex-warden.

There is only one Denny Phalen and he is here with all his jolly Irish good nature. He misses his old friend John Cask.

Mose Filsinger was here the last time the county council met here. He is as fat and jolly as ever and stands the wear and tear of public life well.

Since the January meeting of the County Council Reeve J. G. Murdock, of Lucknow, has passed away and his place has been taken by Mr. John Joynt.

The county council had the pleasure of visiting our hospital on Tuesday and were agreeably surprised to find we had such a splendid institution.

Mr. H. M. Lay, Mr. S. Vogan, and Mr. Norman Robertson, Walkerton, were the delegation to the county council in connection with the grant to the Walkerton hospital.

Mr. C. J. Mickle, Chesley, presented the case of the high schools for increased grants before the county council in good form on Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Moore and Mr. and Mrs. Percy Watson motored to Walkerton on Sunday.—Teeswater News.

Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Traux and son and Mr. and Mrs. Player of Walkerton were the guests of Mrs. A. McKee on Sunday.—Teeswater News.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Irwin and Mrs. Searle and family of Walkerton, spent Sunday with friends in Ripley. They came over in Mr. Irwin's auto.—Ripley Express.

Editor Telescope,
Walkerton, Ontario.
Dear Sir,—

May I beg space in the columns of your paper to bring to the attention of the public a little book which had recently been published by one who lived amongst us, "Spiritual Fundamentals" by Rev J. Lionel Homer, Incumbent of Cargill, Ont.

The volume is a grouping of sermons, covering many phases of christian truth but each emphasizing some fundamental factor in the development of the spiritual life. And surely in these days of unsettlement, of conflict and disaster, when men in the presence of world-wide calamity are led to the uttering of words of wild extravagance and mental hysteria, when on the one hand agnosticism is challenging the church to present her credentials and socialism sees in the conflict the failure of the church to cope with the problems of life and on the other hand the church is seeking to defend and parry, now emphasizing this, now that side of her mission surely in these hours we need to turn once again to those great spiritual fundamentals that lie basic to all our conduct and principle, and this is the mission which this little volume seeks to perform.

Why is it that mankind is failing of the fullest benefits of life in all that its largest meaning indicates? Because as the author so aptly expresses it of the "Barriers of Unbelief".

But this volume deals not with the questions that are peculiar to the recluse and the mystic but it touches those practical problems of daily life, of life in the work-a-day world. Thus in his chapter on The Experience of Simon Peter he says: "There are men to-day hard-working men, who feel that their work does not bring them much reward: they have worked for a long period, but they have not taken much ...... —Man has a spiritual nature there is his own inner self, stained, blotted and transgressed and, sin; he must be born again to the new life of the child of God............A man may go forth to his work and to his labour until evening, from day to day, and month to month, and year to year, and take very little of real and lasting value if he does not in his daily life honour the Almighty." And in the same chapter he utters words which it will be well for the spiritual leaders of the church to heed: "And to-day we do not want merely typical clergyman we do not want men cast in a certain mould, a fixed order............ We want men who, from their own experience, know and feel that all labour without Christ is 'taking nothing' for Him, not winning men not catching, drawing, holding them.',

A word as to the manner in which the author writes there is about the book a touch of that mystic charm grips the attention and not only the attention but compels thought and questioning of the trend of our lives, as for instance in his chapter on "The Right Observance of Good-Friday, "he says: "The Bridegroom shall be taken away from us. Do we care? Is it any thing to us as we live our daily life?"

But my object in writing is not to eulogize the book or the author but to commend it to the public in the hope that its message shall not go unheard, in days when books, good, bad and indifferent. Books of fiction, books on war (Some of them written by men who never witnessed a battle and never saw a diplomatic correspondence books of biography are bought, too often by an indiscriminating public let us find room on our shelves and in our busy lives to read this little volume of quiet heart talks.

Yours sincerely,
W. J. Fidde

EDITORIAL

A political cartoon appearing in Conservative newspapers, represents a wounded Canadian soldier as saying to Sir Wilfred Laurier, "Ask your bunch, Sir Wilfred, if they still think me a drunken loafer." This is a libel on Liberals, with the accent on the "lie." Why not ask Sam Hughes, with his dry canteens.

WARN HOTELMAN

The Ontario license board has issued a warning that where in some local option municipalities former hotel licenses have not only closed their houses but refused to sell or lease to others deserving to serve the needs of the travelling public. Such action will be regarded as a serious obstacle to their procuring licenses again at any time in future under the jurisdiction of the board.

TWENTY DOLLARS AT INTEREST

Let a young man at twenty years of age put twenty dollars at interest, instead of expending it for tobacco. Then at the beginning of the next year repeat it, and include also the principle and interest of the preceeding year, and thus continue to do so from year to year until he shall have reached the age of seventy; the amount he would realize would exceed thirty thousand dollars. How many of our young men will try it?

LEARNING TO SWIM

Swimming has become a part of the regular course of study in many American schools and colleges. At West Point and at Annapolis every cadet must learn to swim. Many of the universities and the most of the newer Young Men's Christian Association buildings have commodious swimming pools. An ingenious apparatus is used to teach swimming in the Public School swimming pools of Cincinnati, Ohio. It is a sort of merry-go-round that the pupils enjoy and that enables an instructor to teach six or eight beginners at once. The harness gives the beginner confidence and very considerably lessens the drudgery. It is suspended from a track above, and runs along on pulleys much as the loaded hay fork does.

NO ONE TO BLAME

The drink traffic hits right and left. It has no regard for sex or age, wealth or poverty. The Hamilton Times reports a coroner's jury case and says in part:

> "It was a sad story that held the attention of the court at the Pearl Foster inquest last night—a story of a young girl who started in life with bright prospects, but slowly drifted down and down until finally the police were called to remove her dead body to the morgue. Coroner Hopkins presided, and having heard all evidence, the jury returned a verdict stating that the deceased had come to her death from the use of alcohol; that blame was attached to no one.

That blame was attached to one. Yes, that's interesting isn't it? No one held responsible. Hamilton, a city almost choked with churches, organizations for combating evils, finds that in spite of all the defensive work it can do, that it is possible for a young girl to fill a drunkard's grave at a comparatively early age. And yet these good people that live in Hamilton have helped to license and legalize the system of which this girl was a victim.

" . . . that blame was attached to no one."

Surely an easy way out, but an answer that no man with a soul or a conscience can possibly accept.

Dear Sir:—

Frequently we hear of towns and cities, that instead of making advancements in their business growth, they are seen to grow as flowers without care, dead. The factories seem to employ less men than in former years, some factories are not running. There are seen many vacant stores and places of business, which are growing shabby and old for want of tenants to help the upkeep of same and not really you will see changes for want of care.

Why all this fall back, why are good times not seen in these places, as in years back. Well, my opinion is, there are lacking the business men with the right kind of energy with absolutely no thoughts of the days ahead, as long as "we take in a dollar to-day, what care we for tomorrow." Never thinking how many more dollars could be taken in if they would get alive [illegible], there's the point.

Walkerton, my home town, is one of the finest laid out in Canada. I do not care where one travels you cannot find one of the main business street, (Durham Street) has the appearance at first of a town twice its size, level and straight, the places of business are not what they could be if there was more business done, the residential streets are all one shady spot with the finest of maple trees, but the lawns are not up to one's expectations. Why? There is nothing that helps to beautify a town or city more than well kept lawns and gardens, which is a drawing card to outsiders every time, it costs a man absolutely not one copper to keep a lawn in order and your spare moments will put many improvements into place.

Walkerton is a very well equipped that is, it has two railroads the one very convenient to the town and factories, a good electric and water system, with the latter it means a good drawer to manufactors in the case of fire protection and no better farming district could be found anywhere, a good large area to draw from. No one can show me where the town going ahead as fast as it should be but if it could and of ever expects to improve, it must soon do it.

Has the town a Board of Trade? I do not think it has. Well how can the town expect to grow, form a good strong Board of Trade, of good strong boosters, get after the different lines of trade, advertise the town and put it in the manufacturing world, get after different Companys wishing to locate, as there will be many outside firms looking for good sites in Canada, lease them your town, the business men can do a heap of good and can improve their sales each day, by joining the Board of Trade. The town council if they were to take a view of other thriving towns, might be able to see their failings. I read some time ago of the council going to Ottawa to interview the Government in regard to different articles that could be manufactured for war purposes. What benefit was that trip to the town? I have not heard of any supplies being manufactured as yet up there although there are several suitable buildings for the making of supplies, the inspiration was there, but you see the energy of the promoters was lacking. Try it anyway. You see that's the way the town's forefathers did, and it was some live town in those days, for instance many can recall Walkerton as a busy prosperous town, with not only one or two Fall Fair days, but a whole week and the old home week, arches and decorations galore, people came from all over, and your base-ball sports of old can recall the fact that Walkerton could trim anything, yes, teams came from London, Detroit, Toronto and other cities, it was the foremost town in every line in those days. What standing did the 32nd. band make, the best, there was no better, now the Formosa band supplies Walkerton with music when it is required. I think the council is to blame for this for a plan could be hit in some way to have a band. The newspapers could boost a Board of Trade and help a lot, for Walkerton wants one and wants it quick.

Trusting I am not taking up too much of your valuable space, I will close again. I remain,

W. Scott Heffernan.

P. S. In a letter to you last winter, I mentioned the fact regarding a market, how this is an improvement to any town, it helps to improve farming and gardening and gives the small farmer or gardener more of a chance, it helps to improve the price of land and and lots and brings the farmer to town with his products instead of shipping them to larger cities. This move would cost nothing as the building is still there, and was meant for the purpose. Other towns have a market day, why not Walkerton.

I understand the C. P. R. intends building their road [illegible] to the lake to make better and closer connection with the boat trade which should help.

Report of the Auditors to the Shareholders of The Merchants Bank of Canada.

In accordance with the provisions of sub-sections 19 and 20 of Section 56 of the Bank Act we report to the shareholders as follows:—

We have examined the above Balance Sheet with the books of Account and other records of the Bank at the Chief Office and with the signed returns from the Branches and Agencies.

We have checked the cash and verified the securities of the Bank at the Chief Office against the entries in regard thereto in the books of the Bank as on April 30th, 1915, and at a different time during the year and found them to agree with such entries. We have also attended at several of the Branches during the year and checked the cash and verified the securities held at the dates of our attendance and found them to agree with the entries in the books of the Bank with regard thereto.

We have obtained all the information and explanations we have required. In our opinion the transactions of the Bank which have come under our notice have been within the powers of the Bank, and the above Balance Sheet is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Bank's affairs according to the best of our information and the explanations given to us and as shown by the books of the Bank.

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE's editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE's circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the women's page, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

(By C. Edwardes)

Badside Hole, Forest.

"Carissima—How goes my Eve to-day? And how is my own heart, if you please, for it is in your keeping, sweet, and I don't know a thing about it except that I'm very well aware of the loss of it? I wish I had somebody else's to fill the void—wish I were certain about it, I mean, but I'm most horribly not certain even yet. Behold, I rave a bit. It's partly because I took a trional last night and slept a sleep of profundity ending in a haze. I don't see things clearly through the haze, and I gape and gape and gape. But how is my little Eve? That's everything to me—that and the wonder of her eyes, her sweet kiddy ways and her laughter at everything and nothing, when she is in the mood, but she isn't always, is she? Lucky little maid, to be able to laugh at nothing even sometimes. There are folks who can cry at nothing so I've heard—because the tears in them are all dried up. Mercy be good to us, what a time they must have had, poor things, mustn't they?

"Sister Anne comes to pick a bone with me at 1 p.m. precisely. She's sent a five-cornered note to say so. What do you think of that? There's going to be a campaign over the chops and cheese. The battles of ancient Philistines or Amorites (or were they Ammonites?—hanged if I know), they won't be in it compared with this forthcoming affray over my chops and cheese. I who write to you declare it, Evie. And each of us is going to fight to the death for the good of one, though not the same one. Hey did diddle! The Lord defend the right. I can't raise it higher than that. And I can't write another line because I'm rather dafted by that cursed trional which gave me so blessed a slumber last night and so confuses my intelligence this morning. I send you some tulips and beg the favor of a reply to the great question. How is my Eve? And how is my own heart? Your

"Rupert."

The Hon. Rupert Whilden's man John carried this across the eight miles of forest and seaboard which separated his master in rural retirement from his master's heart's joy and keeper in little over the hour brought back a reply.

"Dear Mr. Whilden,—How lovely of you to send me such lovely flowers! I am really better this morning—really and truly better. The pain has gone from my chest. I am so glad you have had a good night at last. You are not to worry about me. I'm not worth it. I lie awake at night and wonder what you can see in me to make you so fond of me. Am I really so pretty in your eyes? I love to think so, but—but I must not continue to think so, for I am going to tell you something very important. You are not to let me come between you and your sister any longer. I do love you, dear—I can't help saying so—but your sister is so proud, and so proud of you, and it makes me shiver to remember my terrible visit to her last Monday. I understand what you mean about you and Lady Anne both fighting for the good of one, but not the same one. Isn't they say love is blind? But perhaps he isn't always, for I think I never loved you so much as I do now, and yet I can see things as they ought to be and must. Lady Anne is right about my being only an infatuation that will pass, but it serves me right, for I ought to have known better from the beginning, as Lady Anne said, and not allow myself to love you. But I couldn't help it—I truly couldn't. I'm afraid I'm very weak at resisting temptations. But I'm keeping your servant waiting, and so goodby. From your true and more sensible little friend.

"Eve Mulgrave."

"P. S.—I return your heart as I ought."

Rupert Whilden had not sworn once since coming to Badside Hole, but this time he uttered two tremendous words ere he reached the end of Eve's letter, and when he came to the postcript he said "Damnation!"

He was upon a sofa in the window recess of the Badside Hole morning room. A hunting spill and a sprain had fastened him there.

He was a long figure on the sofa, a crimson vest with amber buttons perhaps the most striking detail of him, after his nose, which was masterful; his dark eyes, which were now likewise, and his chin, which was as square as a chin well can be. He was neither old nor young, and yet he didn't look middle aged.

He dropped the letter when he came to the postcript and lay in an open-eyed trance, and he was still thus lying when his man John entered with a tumbler and a great respect for his master's tranquillity.

"Ah!" he exclaimed; then, rousing himself, "Tell me, did you see Miss Mulgrave?"

"Yes, sir. Mr. Mulgrave was good enough to ask me into the cottage."

"And you waited there while she wrote it?" The words "Lucky Brute" were in his eyes, if not upon his tongue.

"Yes, sir," replied Man John, as if apologetically.

"Er—did she appear to be pretty well?"

Man John twitched—it was his way of suppressing unseemly surprise. He was not used to his master's voice in that quiet, almost wistful key.

"Not very, sir, I think. She was like as if she'd been crying, but perhaps it was only the sun in her eyes, sir. It's a beautiful warm morning for March."

"Is it? Is it? That'll do. Tell them to get a first class lunch to-day. Lady Anne will bring her golf appetite with her, no doubt. And just give me my writing pad. I may want you to run over to Bladingwood again. Come back in half an hour."

"Very good, sir," said Man John. He supplied the writing pad and wished to do more, but no more was immediately required of him. Then Rupert returned to Eve Mulgrave's letter and frowned fiercely over it, and when he came to that postcript about his heart his crimson swelled as if 'ridiculous'—the heart she had sent with the letter were only now reinstating itself in its old quarters.

And then he lay on his back and frowned at the ceiling in a new kind of trance, and he was still thus frowning when Man John reappeared. It was not so much a frown of irritation as of firm determination now.

"What's the matter?" he demanded loudly. Man John knew that tone very well and sometimes had painful cause to remember it.

"I beg pardon, sir, I thought"—he stammered.

But his master spared him the effort of finishing.

"Ah," he said, "I've changed my mind. And, by the way, tell them that Lady Anne likes rusks instead of bread."

The quality of his nod of dismissal made Man John turn briskly on his heels. It was like old times to see. And in those old times the Hon. Rupert Whilden often spoke as well as looked hurtfully.

Alone again, Rupert shut his eyes, his waistcoat swelled as before, and the words whispered to him, "The old girl may be right, after all!"

* * *

Lady Ann Whilden came in like a gust, cried "Hello!" from the doorway, kissed the invalid, sat down in the sofa and stretched her feet mannishly afar.

They contemplated each other the invalid with a cigarette and the lady with her hands on her tweed covered knees.

"Has that creature gone—as she promised?" asked Lady Anne abruptly. She had much silver hair, which she wore short, two cold blue eyes and a chin and mouth as strong as her brother's.

"What creature do you mean?" asked her brother, controlling himself.

"You know perfectly well whom I mean," said Lady Anne. "But no doubt she has left Bladingwood. No doubt at all." And the Lady Anne sneered.

"Ah!" said her brother, marking the sneer. "You are wrong. Miss Mulgrave has not left Bladingwood."

"Then she soon will," exclaimed Lady Anne, with a steely glitter in her eyes. "You have my word for that. I possess the most absolute proof that she is nothing better than a common thief. I shall go straight to her after I'm fed, and—Yes, you may stare, Rupert. I shall."

The invalid looked his sister up and down, and a smile came to his lips.

"A thief?" he said.

"Yes. The oval ring of diamonds and emeralds which belonged to our mother—that's what she's taken. I trust Hamilton as I would you, Rupert, and she has formed the same opinion. I was wearing it just before that Miss Mulgrave called upon me."

"You invited her to call upon you, Anne, I understand?"

"Yes, of course. I remember taking it off and putting it down somewhere. Then I went upstairs, and Hamilton came to tell me she was there. You know what a memory I have—it's the family failing, isn't it? Until last night I didn't give it another thought. Then we hunted everywhere, and Hamilton and I agree that she must have taken it."

"Must?" suggested the invalid, not exactly smiling.

"Why, naturally. A low chorus girl out of a theatre! What do they know of morality, any of them? They're born to exploit men and things, without a care about any one except themselves. She's just like the rest, her baby face and all."

Rupert's head seemed to sway acquiescingly.

The Lady Anne freshened and transferred a hand from her knee-cap to her brother's shoulder.

self again at last, Rupert," she said, warmly.

But the invalid's shoulder fidgeted under her grip, and his remoter hand crushed Eve Mulgrave's letter, which had lain by him on the sofa. "Myself again, am I?" he murmured. And then, a diversion occurred and neither Eve nor the ring nor the invalid's recovery of his earlier self was mentioned again for many minutes. The luncheon table was wheeled up to the sofa, then Lady Anne skinned off her gloves, and the soup was served.

"Ground's grand again after the rain," she said with her first spoonful. She spoke as if she loved the letter "g."

"That's well," said the invalid, "and"—appealing to the servant—"where are those rusks I spoke about?"

They had been forgotten.

"How dear and extraordinary of you to remember my little fads!" declared Lady Anne.

"Not at all; not at all. And so you had a nice morning?"

"Delicious! I wouldn't have knocked off for any one but you, Rupert. I feel as if I can go on forever when I'm in to-day's form."

"Ah!" The invalid's eyebrows rose. "As fit as that, are you? Good woman!"

"Ha, ha!" chuckled the Lady Ann.

"Yes, and you look your 'Ha, ha!' too—and that's a queer thing from a man's point of view."

The Lady Anne fixed him with her eyes.

"What do you mean?" she asked, seeming suspicious of something.

But the rusks and the maid intervened, and the invalid did not tell his sister what he meant.

The Lady Anne's appetite was great. She confessed it laughingly and said she didn't propose to stint it. And when the meal was over and the table was drawn away she asked for a cigarette and lit it and blew a cloud of cerulean smoke and leaned back and again stretched out her nether limbs as if she wished to show even her brother what small feet she had and how handsomely lemon colored golf shoes became them.

"To return to our muttons, my dear Rupert," she said, watching her smoke thin to nothingness.

The invalid lay propped at his ease, with his arms folded. He had said very little indeed during the repast, and eaten little.

"Aren't you smoking?" asked his sister.

He wasn't even looking at her until she spoke. Then he turned to her and loosed his thunder at her.

"Anne," he said calmly, "I do think you're one of the worst specimens that was ever born into this world of bad 'uns."

It startled her.

"What's that?" she gasped, dropping her cigarette and catching it in mid-air with real smartness.

"Almost a friend, Anne. That ring business is a plant. Do you think I can't see through it? You and your maid want boiling—that is, if she's in it with you, which I can't think. She can't be as rotten as you. And see here, now, if you dare to go to Eve with such a rotten accusation"— He slipped his injured leg to the floor and seemed unconscious of the shock. His eyes blazed at his sister, and hers blazed back at him. "You're a vile cat, Anne, that's what you are! Be hanged to you! And this game of shoving spokes in a wheel hasn't worked, I give you my word. There was a chance just before you came, but you've muffed it—ab-so-lutely. I don't know what you said to her on Monday when she was good enough—I mean that, really good enough—to cross your threshold. As it happens now, I don't care either. But read this and judge for yourself. She could teach you a lot, Anne, and will some day—you'll see."

He fluttered Eve's letter to his sister's lap, restored his leg to the sofa and faced the window.

The Lady Anne didn't seem eager about the letter. Her complexion had patches of red-purple in its brown. She muttered, "Upon my word!" twice, accenting "upon" the first time and "word" the second.

"I wouldn't be such a woman as you for all the world could offer me," said the invalid softly, with his back toward her. He spoke as if for the instruction of the window panes or the budding shrubs beyond.

"Thank you!" the Lady Anne snapped, and her fingers simultaneously snapped at the letter.

Silence ruled while she read. Rupert on the sofa looked past the Badside Hole shrubs far past them. A soothing vision of Eve was plain to him in the bluish haze of the country Bladingwood way. He could see her eyes with those tears in them at which Man John had hinted. More still, he could see her heart. It was the one thing in human nature he knew that he knew.

Still held by his vision of her, he broke the silence.

"I shall marry her as soon as we're both fit," he murmured. But it was the Lady Anne's turn now. She jeered to begin with, and then broke out drily.

"She'll not give you the chance, my dear. I would bet a small fortune she'll be back in town tomorrow—with my ring. That's the meaning of this hypocritical rot. She'll swear she never saw it till she's black in the face, and what can I say to that? Smug as she is, she'd Billingsgate me dumb in argument for value received—that's a sure thing. Well, so be it!" The Lady Anne rose, shrugged, shook her skirts like a damp retriever and laughed a sportswoman's laugh. "If she's content with a ring worth £100 and leaves you to your senses I'll pocket my loss and thank her."

Making a ball of Eve Mulgrave's letter, she tossed it into the fire.

"I'll be off and tell her so if she's there," she added.

The invalid rolled round and said, "Wait a bit!"

"Not a second," she cried.

"Yes," said he. "A good many seconds, Anne. You've got to eat your dust first, my lady, here and now. I marry Eve Mulgrave as soon as it can be managed—that I swear to you. You've made it certain, my dear. I think you know me as well as most folks, and when I say I've done with you from this moment unless you take back that accusation you know what to expect. Don't be such a cad, Anne. And when you've apologized to me, be off and apologize to Eve. You make me sick."

Lady Anne received his volley with the air of a good fighter.

"Scarcely," she said. "You were never more out of it, Rupert, if you think me capable of that."

* * * * *

And then there was silence again, while their eyes carried on the duel. The invalid's smile with his gaze fascinated the Lady Anne strangely. She ought to have stormed at him, but said nothing more. And when some one knocked and the door opened and the servant spoke words in which "her ladyship's maid, sir," drifted to her ears, even then she didn't feel interested until her brother also had spoken and Hamilton entered and began to explain herself.

"I thought I ought to come at once. It was in the silver ink pot on the French table in the drawing room. I emptied the ink pot to clean it, and I put on my things at once. I hoped I might catch your ladyship before you left Badside Hole."

Lady Anne's palm received her maid's offering of the precious and hateful ring, but it was the invalid on the sofa, not her mistress, who thanked the maid for her zeal in good works.

"Very kind of you," he said, quietly.

The maid said "Not at all, sir," and withdrew. She looked at her mistress, but her mistress, but the mistress was engaged with the fire. And when she shut the door after her the Lady Anne was still looking at the fire, with the ring of evidence almost crushed in her hand.

* * * *

More moments of silence passed. The invalid on the sofa watched his sister with an unruffled brow and an expression that grew more and more merciful. At length he laughed softly.

"You always were a rum 'un, Anne," he said, "but the ink pot'll take some beating."

The Lady Anne turned and approached the sofa blinkingly.

"You don't believe now that I meant to—to—" she whispered, with staring eyes. She couldn't go on. A gurgle stopped her.

"Goodness me, no!" said he. "Nor any one else in his senses, my dear. Those trionals do play the mischief with me the next day. That's all right, Anne. I'm as sorry as can be. But we understand each other, I hope. Ring for coffee or something. I'm just simply glad you've got it again. You'll be wanting to go on with your golf, though."

"No," said the Lady Anne, sharply. "I shan't." Her complexion was horribly mottled, but there was a handsome light in her strong eyes. "Do you know what I'm going to do?"

"Couldn't guess."

"No?" The Lady Anne stooped and tucked a kiss at the invalid's forehead. "Well, then, I shan't tell you till it's done. Goodby."

She rushed from the room as she rushed that kiss. But she returned in about a minute and told him after all.

"I'm going to Bladingwood, Rupert," she said, fiercely. "She is a good little thing. That's how she impressed me, and I was a liar to say anything to the contrary. Whether she's good enough for you is quite beside the point, I suppose, seeing you've made up your mind. It's something in these days to find one that's good. There! Will that satisfy you?"

But she didn't wait for his reply. She had eaten her dust and couldn't start digesting it even before him. She digested it on the journey and afterward, and the mercy of circumstances was such that she didn't find it nearly so painful a process as she was prepared for.

But when she returned to Badside Hole, flushed by the wind and her emotions, she bustled straight to Rupert and his sofa and told him what more she had done.

"She sends you her love, old boy," she says, hoarse as a man, "and the next time you see her you'll see that blessed ring on her finger. What do you think of that, Rupert?"

See What Dame Fashion Has Done; Turned Calendar Upside Down to Please Summer Girl

"Dear Peggy Girl—Have you bought your summer furs? Yes, Furs!—that's exactly what I said, and I haven't turned the calendar upside down, either and I haven't mixed the seasons. Everybody's wearing furs this summer, and take Betty Brown's word for it, they are fascinating whether they trim your parasol, swathe your neck or top off your hat.

"I hate to think how it will feel to have a white fox stole curled 'round one's neck when Old Sol is smiling his sunniest, but I know that a polar bear dozing on an iceberg is no cooler-looking than a girl swathed in snow-white furs, and, you know, dear Peggy, no girl will worry about how she feels when her looks defy criticism."

BETTY BROWN PREDICTS PICTURE SUITS

A "picture suit" is one of many delightful surprises Dame Fashion has in store for the Summer Girl. The gown I sketched for this illustration is made up in sand-colored Gaberdine, but it would be equally fetching in linen, ratine or any of the heavy-weight wash materials.

The coat is pleated below the waist line, and these pleats give the desired fullness above the waist and they emphasize the slenderness of the hips. The three backward turning pleats are held by the belt.

The flare of the coat gives a glimpse of the natty little pockets; the button trimming adds to the trimness of the suit.

WAR CLOTHES ARE CHANGING

In peace time it was always a joke that changes in uniform were constantly being devised from the wanton motive of artistic self indulgence. Subalterns with small allowances used to be exceedingly angry at finding themselves obliged to buy a red sash instead of a gold one or to have their mess jacket fitted with a new design of button and the "military millinery department" at the war office was a fair butt for the critic's scorn.

The whims of peace, however, have been far outweighed by the necessities of war. In fact, if the great war lasts much longer it may come to have as lasting an effect upon the dress of the army as the South African campaign, which abolished the traditional scarlet coat except for occasions of high ceremonial and made khaki the only wear. New garments have been introduced which already make the British soldier hardly recognizable to his civilian countrymen. The first man you meet wearing one of the short fur coats which have lately been served out, with a knitted Balaclava helmet instead of a field-service cap, hardly looks like a soldier at all. Until you get used to him he has an obstinate resemblance to the conventional picture of Robinson Crusoe.

It is a virtue of the English army clothing authorities that they seem to be thoroughly utilitarian in their new idea about soldiers' dress. Mere smartness is not allowed to interfere with comfort and convenience. The new kind of officer's cap, for instance, has a sloppy look that would horrify a German military tailor. It was discovered in the trenches that the ordinary field-service cap, particularly the officer's, which is of finer cloth, reflected the light, and made a good mark. The simple expedient has accordingly been adopted of taking out the wires that stiffen the cloth. The new kind of cap that is the result may not be smart, but it certainly is practical, and if the change results in saving the life of a single subaltern it will have been worth while.

There have been a whole lot of minor alterations in the British officer's uniform since the war began. The Sam Brown belt is by way of giving place to a new webbing equipment like the one worn by the men. Even the khaki shirt and tie, which came in only a short while ago, may have to go.

They make the officer less conspicuous at short range among his men, with their tunics buttoned up to the chin. The "British warm" has ousted the imposing, full-skirted great-coat and the spring rains will see the officer in another unfamiliar garment, an oiled silk poncho, which hangs loosely down all over him from the neck, without sleeves.

The British army has gradually become the envy of the rest, both friend and foe, in regard to the comfort of its clothes. "Costume de Chasse" was the rather patronizing criticism of the first French soldiers who met the expeditionary force when it disembarked, for the French love a little panache in a soldier's dress—a little swank, as a Cockney boy would say. "They look like chauffeurs," is what the Germans said, according to a prisoner. But now everybody on the allies' side at least is adopting something very like our uniform as fast as they can get the khaki cloth to make it. The interpreters' corps, both French and Belgian, are dressed exactly like English soldiers except for their headgear, which is still the national kepi, though covered with khaki cloth. They were the first to adopt it, and for good reason. At the beginning of the war the French interpreters were one of the most handsomely dressed corps in the army. They had a black tunic, with blue velvet facings, scarlet riding breeches with black braid, and patent-leather boots. Among the sombre khaki of the British regiments to which they were attached these brilliant figures were most conspicuous, and the losses among the interpreters were great until it was wisely ordered that they should wear khaki, too.

To other branches of the French and Belgian armies, however, the vogue of the English uniform is spreading. There is a regiment of French zouaves, dressed entirely in khaki, baggy trousers, fezzes and all. I was staying some time ago in the same billet with some young Belgians of a crack cavalry corps, who, while I was there, suddenly adopted Sam Browne belts, a fashion which is spreading in their army. "I have sent to London for a whole lot of khaki shirts and ties," another Belgian told me. "Khaki pyjamas, too," he added gravely. "Le cravate kakki" is evidently going to have the same rage in France as it did in England after the Boer war.

A really practical headgear does not seem to have been devised yet, though there has probably never been a war in which there were so many different styles in the field, from the German Pickelhaube to a Moorish caftan.

The Belgians started the worst off. Their infantry wore only the bonnet de police, which is just a glengarry bonnet without strings. This they found most unsatisfactory. It neither protected a man's eyes from the sun in front nor the nape of his neck from the rain behind. During the hot days of August and September the men were constantly sticking sheets of cardboard under the front of the cap to form a peak. So about three months ago the Belgians adopted a kepi rather like the French one, but lower in the crown, with a black leather peak in front.

But the kepi itself is not a great success. It soon gets sodden with rain and the leather peak loses its shape, and it has the same objection to it as our field-service cap—that it offers a great deal of resistance to a high wind.

"The German helmet is about as good a soldier's headgear as there is," said a Belgian officer who gives his attention to these things. "It is light and comfortable to wear; it is waterproof, and its peaks in front and behind carry off the rain from the man's neck and eyes. It is distinctive, which is an advantage and it serves for both peace and war; on service you fit a canvas cover to it; for parade you polish up its brass."

The fact that most of the fighting in this war has been at short ranges has put rather in the background the idea of an invisible color for uniforms which led to the adoption of khaki in the British army, though ingenious suggestions are in fact being made that soldiers should be dressed in zebra-like stripes of different colors, or at least have the shadows cast by different parts of their dress painted out. But no scheme of protective coloring will make a man invisible at 50 yards, and the French, who love the brilliant uniforms of their corps d'elite and have a sentimental feeling even for the coarse red trousers of their infantry, are rather pleased that they did not adopt the green reseda uniform which was proposed a year or two ago. Stress of circumstances or shortage of cloth, however, has led to one or two changes in material. Besides the khaki in the case of the zouaves referred to just now, and the corduroy uniforms you sometimes see on soldiers on service at a base, there is the new tricolor cloth, which is being used chiefly for officers' tunics and for men's greatcoats. It is called tricolor because the shade, a blue-gray, is supposed to be a mingling of the three colors of the national flag. It is quite the prettiest of all invisible cloths. The French have introduced too, apparently following the example of the British, a webbing equipment of belt and braces and cartridge pouch of the same material as the English, but a kind of heliotrope in color.—London Daily Mail.

Her Baby Had Dysentery.

Had Two Doctors. No Result.

WAS CURED BY THE USE OF DR. FOWLER'S Extract of Wild Strawberry.

In dysentery the discharges from the bowels follow each other with great rapidity, and sometimes become mixed with blood.

Never neglect what at first appears to be a slight attack of diarrhoea or dysentery will surely set in. Cure the first symptoms by the use of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry.

Mrs. Martin Farraher, Dogherty Corner, N.B., writes: "I can very strongly recommend Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for dysentery and summer complaints. My little girl, at the age of two years, had the dysentery very bad. We had two doctors, but with no result. My mother brought me a bottle of "Dr. Fowler's," and when half the bottle was used the little girl was running around playing with her dolls with great delight and joy to the family, for we did not think she would ever get better."

There are a number of preparations on the market to-day, claiming to be the same as "Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry," and also called similar names, so as to fool the public into thinking they are getting the genuine.

"Dr. Fowler's" is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont. See that their name is on the wrapper.

WOMEN GAMBLERS.

(Buck's Weekly, Montreal.)

The fashionable way in Montreal to raise money for any charitable object is to hold a public bridge. Tickets are sold at a dollar, and include tea, which is generally atrocious. The other day, at the Ritz-Carlton, the tea was disgraceful—no bread and butter, cake absolutely uneatable, and the skimmiest of skim milk.

Why, then, do the women flock in hundreds to such bridges? It can hardly be because they are dying to contribute a dollar to the special charity, because they can do that without going to the bridge. The answer is probably to be found in the fact that the women love a gamble. The prizes given at these bridges are exceedingly handsome. The smallest is worth more than the admission and the handsomest are often worth from $10 to $15. A woman pays one dollar, sees a lot of other women, has her name in the papers, wears her best clothes, and runs the chance of winning a big prize!

The method of awarding these prizes is not entirely satisfactory. The top prizes go to the biggest scorers. So to run up a big score it is necessary to double. Doubling is allowed, but not redoubling. So a woman can say to her table:

"Now we will all double the opponents make. It is the same for everybody, and thus we shall have a big score."

A woman at a recent bridge told me that her score was 1,700 points, and she had won every rubber. Naturally she expected to be near the top, but to her surprise she was away down in the list, the top score being over 7,000. Then she was told about the doubling dodge.

The only reasonable fair way for these charitably inclined ladies to gamble is to forbid doubling, and then to subtract the less from the greater and credit the winner with the result.

Was Weak and Run Down.

COULD NOT STAND THE LEAST EXCITEMENT.

When one gets weak and run down the heart becomes affected, the nerves become unstrung and the least excitement causes a feeling of utter lassitude. What is needed is to build up the heart and strengthen the shaky nerves by the use of such a medicine as Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills.

Mrs. J. A. Wilmans, Tilbenburg, Ont., writes: "I cannot speak too highly of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. I suffered greatly with my nerves, and was so weak and run down I could not stand the least excitement of any kind. I believe your Heart and Nerve Pills to be a valuable remedy for all sufferers from nervous trouble."

BARGAINING FOR LUCY

The first view I ever had of Farmer Hodges' daughter Lucy she was wading a stream. Her shoes and stockings she held in her hands and lifted her skirts to her knees. Her hair had fallen down her back, and her straw hat hung from her neck over the hair. She was as pretty a piece of human flesh as I ever saw.

The old man owned a stock farm. Among the animals on it was a bay filly, pretty as a picture, that I very much wanted. That was at the same time that I wanted his daughter. He set great store by Lucy, and I knew that it would break him all up to lose her. It's no fool of a job to go to a man and ask him to give up the girl he's raised from babyhood, and I didn't have any fancy for it. I rehearsed all I would say to Farmer Hodges. I would introduce the subject by asking if he would sell the bay filly, praise her to the skies, then offer him a big price for her. This would put him in a good humor, taking advantage of which I would ask him for Lucy.

I parted from Lucy at ten o'clock on a moonlight night at the gate, it being arranged that I should go up the next evening after supper when her father was smoking his pipe on the porch and then and there put in my application. I didn't say anything to Lucy as to my intentions with regard to opening the subject, for when we separated I hadn't thought anything about that. I just told her I was going to brace up and ask for her.

It was a hot evening when I called, and the farmer, instead of sitting on porch, had put his rocker on the grass before it, where he could get more air. He asked me to have a chair that stood beside him and I sat down for the hardest job of work I ever did in my life.

"Selling much stock now, Mr. Hodges?" I asked.

"Oh, I get rid of a few animals now and then, but I can't say that I am doin' very much."

"Reckon I can take one of 'em off your hands if you and I can agree on a price. I've taken a shine to that little bay filly with one white foot and a white spot on her forehead."

"You mean Lucy, I reckon."

"I was speaking of the bay filly," I stammered, suspecting he had forestalled my real object.

"She's Lucy. I've called her after my daughter. She's a rattlin' fine animal."

"You bet," I hastened to chime in return.

"Kind and gentle as a suckin' dove, no mean tricks about her, easy goin', obedient to the ribbons—in fact, she's the best little girl I've got on the place."

"That's just the disposition I want. I wouldn't like any balking or kicking or anything like that. I don't believe in using the whip, but if there's anything vicious I think it ought to be laid on well."

At that instant looking up, I saw Lucy herself—the real Lucy—at the window. Her father's back was toward her, so he couldn't see her. I faced her. She wore a very peculiar expression. Indeed she looked mad enough to bite through a nail.

"If you want Lucy," the farmer replied, with the deliberate twang of one selling a horse, "you can have her to try. If you like her you can keep her on any terms satisfactory to you. If you don't like her you can turn her back on me."

"You'll have to excuse me just now," continued the old man. "There comes a man to make a dicker for some of my racing stock. Do as you please about Lucy."

It was a terrible disappointment to get no further in the matter, or, rather, not to get the real object of my visit, but a man came in at the gate and the farmer went to meet him. I looked up at the window where my girl had appeared, but she was not there. I waited till there was nobody about, when she came down and, marching right past me, made for the road. I followed and called to her.

"Lucy! For heaven's sake, what is the matter?"

"What do you mean by talking so about me?"

"About you?"

"Yes. I heard you. So you're going to apply the whip, are you? Not on me!"

"But Lucy?"

"And father! What has come over him? To think of his saying that if you don't like me you can turn me back on him!"

I burst out laughing. Catching her about the waist, I kissed away her tears that were trickling down her cheeks. Then I explained the matter to her, and the next day asked for a woman, not a horse.

DOES HEREDITY EXIST?

If it Does it Has Never Been Proved, it is Claimed.

Is there such a thing as heredity? A father has blue eyes, and so has his son. Is there a special energy or force that did this? Suppose his son has brown eyes. Did heredity stop acting? Was it, so to speak, turned off? That is absurd. The forces which caused the boy's eyes in one case to be like the father's and in the next case unlike were the same. No one doubts that. No new force or energy had been introduced.

Heredity, therefore, is not a thing in itself. It has no existence, in fact. It denotes no constant actual living force. It is simply a noun derived from the adjective hereditary. Hereditary means handed down from parent to child, simply that and nothing more. An estate is hereditary. The brown eyes were as truly hereditary as the blue, no more, no less. As all life proceeds from life, all life in every detail is hereditary. Try to realize and be certain of this. It will prevent you from falling into errors. It is commonly said, for instance, that certain qualities are hereditary and others not. For instance, a genius suddenly appearing of commonplace progenitors is said not to be hereditary. But a genius is born, so he must be hereditary in the true sense; genius is not acquired.

Thus in common usage the word hereditary is abused and twisted into meaning something it does not mean, namely, a tendency in children to reproduce the more or less unusual qualities of parents. It is assumed that there is such a general tendency, but it has never been proved.—Atlantic.

THE BEST TREATMENT FOR CONSTIPATION

The Experience of One Who Knows and Places Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills First.

It is not difficult to secure a medicine that will effect movement of the bowels. To cure Constipation and the complications which arise from it is another matter.

Constipation of the bowels is usually preceded by torpid action of the liver. Hence it follows that if Constipation is to be cured the liver must be set right. And here lies the secret of the success of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills. They awaken the action of the liver and insure a good flow of bile, which is nature's cathartic. The liver, kidneys and bowels are invigorated and regulated, and the troubles with the digestive system disappear.

Mr. H. M. Bell, Innisfail, Alta., writes: "For some considerable time I have been using Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, which I have obtained through your firm. I suppose during my life I have used nearly all the best-known pills, as I have been subject to Constipation and digestive troubles. A friend recommended Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, and I can honestly say that of all the pills I have tried nothing has suited me better—action always insured, and fine for the kidneys. This is how I have found them after a thorough test, and you may use this statement if you like."

This letter should convince you of the merits of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, but there is nothing like personal experience. If you do not feel like risking 25 cents for a box, write to us for a free sample box, mentioning where you saw this advertisement. Put this medicine to the test when you have indigestion, constipation, biliousness, backache or kidney derangements. The results will soon prove to you the superiority of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills. One pill a dose, 25 cents a box; all dealers, or Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

FARM AND GARDEN

STRAWBERRY CULTURE.

In strawberry culture the beginner should go slow, getting out a few hundred plants. Select an elevated site, to avoid freezing of the blooms in early spring.

Any good soil that is rich and well drained, that will grow either corn or potatoes, is adapted for strawberries. If possible, use land that has been cultivated in some hoed crop at least two years before setting out the strawberry plants, so as to rid the soil of weeds as far as possible, and also the white grub, an insect that is destructive to strawberry beds.

Before setting the plants the land must be put in the best possible shape. It must be thoroughly tilled and left smooth and level. If plants come from a distance it is a good plan to have them come early and trench them closely together in a rich spot in the garden, watering and shading them until they revive, and only apply water afterward to keep them in growing condition until ready to plant out permanently where wanted. The plants can be kept in these close quarters until the other spring work is over, and then set out at any time when the weather is favorable and the soil in best condition.

When the plants are thus closely trenched together the land that is to take them finally can be thoroughly fined and got in the best possible condition, the weeds killed by frequent cultivation and all stones and rubbish removed.

When finally ready to plant out permanently the plants can be wet down thoroughly, taken up in pans with earth clinging to the roots and set out where wanted.

Strawberry rows should be marked as straight as possible, and from 3 1-2 to 5 feet apart, depending on the kind of culture to be given. If all the runners are allowed to grow, the latter distance, but if best results are attained the rows should be 3 1-2 feet apart, the plants one foot apart in the row, and only four to six young plants allowed to form from one parent, leaving them at regular intervals about the parent plant, and cutting off all others that grow.

The proper time to set strawberry plants is in the early spring, soon as the soil will work nicely. A few plants for the garden may be set in most any growing month, but the condition of plants must be taken into consideration, as they are never so thrifty as in early spring. The plants must be set with roots straight down in the soil, the roots being spread out as much as is possible, so as to come in contact with the soil.

After the plants are set the soil should be stirred shallow close up about them, the horse cultivator started and kept going at least once a week so long as growing lasts. When the runners spread out narrow up the cultivator, but keep it going.

Soon after the plants are set the blooms will appear. These should be cut off the first year, and also the first five or six runners, to give the plant a chance to get stock before having to endure the strain of runner production. The little fruit you would get the first year, if you allow the plants to bear, would be more than offset by the weakened vigor of plants shown in the next year's crop. Everything should be done to make the first crop as large as possible.

There is no hard-and-fast rule to give in regard to the hoeing. Some growers hoe four times, others six to eight, or even more. It is not best to let the weeds get the start at any time. Frequent stirring of the soil with hoe and cultivator not only kills the weeds, but it stimulates vigorous growth, especially until growth is stopped by frost in the fall.

Strawberries require large quantities of concentrated or commercial fertilizers to give best results. We advise using a high-grade fertilizer, analyzing 4 per cent nitrogen, 10 per cent phosphoric acid and 10 per cent potash, at the rate of a ton to the acre.

One-third of this should be applied to the soil before the plants are set, one-third during the growing season, between the plants, and the remaining one-third on the rows in the spring before growth starts, the fruiting year. In applying the fertilizer before the plants are set, we mark the ground, scatter the fertilizer on the row, cultivate this in and then mark again for setting the plants.

In applying fertilizer at any time be careful to brush it off with a broom if any falls on the growing plants. The spring fertilizing of strawberries before fruiting is very important; often it will double the crop. They seem to then need some quick-acting, stimulating manure to help out the plants and force them to bearing a large crop.

On the approach of winter the plants should be mulched with some coarse material, not to keep them warm, but to prevent heaving. The whole surface of the grounds, plants and all, should be covered about three inches, or just enough to entirely hide everything green. The covering should be left until the plants start to grow in the spring, when the most of it should be removed from directly over the plants and placed in the paths between the rows. It is well to leave about one inch of the covering right over the plants, allowing them to grow up through it. This thin covering of mulch acts as a smother to all young weeds that would otherwise spring up to sap the vitality from the plants and to conserve moisture during the fruiting season. For mulching material use marsh hay or any kind of straw free of weed seeds.

All weeds such as dock, thistles, and chickweed, should be removed from the beds in spring before blossoming time.

NOTES.

The boy who likes farm animals will make more spending money by raising calves, sheep, pigs and colts than in leaving the farm to work in town. The farm furnishes a good home while one is getting income from farm animals.

Some folks go at milking as they would at pumping water, acting for all the world just as if the cow had no more feeling than the pump handle they are pulling. Some cows are extremely sensitive in these matters, and shrink as if to get away from their unfeeling milkers. The cow which does this cannot do her best.

Unless a cow's feed is very moist she must have a large quantity of drinking water to insure a good flow of milk. Feed up to the highest notch all of the time cows are being milked.

The power of production in a cow is inherited. If the cow is a good dairy animal by inheritance and is given good care and feed she will become more productive as she increases in age. The quantity rather than the quality of her milk is influenced by feed.

The Word "Rajah."

Literally the word rajah means king, and maharajah the great king or ruler over several kings, but generally speaking the titles rajah, maharajah and nawab have no greater significance than the words feudal lords as used in mediaeval times in Europe. Many of them have been made by the will of the reigning chief, many honored for meritorious acts and deeds.—Exchange.

JUST WHY J. A. HILL RECOMMENDS DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

He Had Sore Back and Other Symptoms of Kidney Disease and Got Real Benefit from Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Sixty-Nine Corners, Ont., June 7.—(Special).—"I am recommending Dodd's Kidney Pills as the best of medicines." The speaker was Mr. J. A. Hill, a well known resident of this place, and he left no doubt in the minds of his hearers that he meant every word he said.

"Some time ago," Mr. Hill continued, "I had a very sore back. It started from a cold and I suffered for six months with it. I also had stiffness in my joints and cramps in my muscles and I felt heavy and sleepy after meals. My appetite was fitful and my limbs were heavy. Then I decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills. I took four boxes and received great benefit from them. That's why I recommend Dodd's Kidney Pills."

Every one of Mr. Hill's symptoms showed that his trouble was of the Kidneys. That is why he got such benefit from Dodd's Kidney Pills. They are no cure all, but they do cure sick Kidneys, and the Kidneys are the keystone of health.

Lunar Vegetation.

Prof. Pickering, of the Harvard astronomical observatory, declares that there is nothing less true than that the moon is without air, water or vegetation. There are certain large lunar areas that darken toward lunar noon and fade out toward lunar sunset. They correspond in some degree to the so-called Martian seas, and Prof. Pickering uses the terms "fields" to describe these plains or slopes, which he believes to be covered with vegetation. He is convinced that the dark fields to be seen during the lunar summer do not owe their blackness to shadow, for you can see them at full moon, when shadows are absolutely invisible. The blue-black color of the fields and canals, he argues, can therefore be owing only to a discoloration of the surface that comes alike on slopes and levels in the lunar summer, and that is invisible in the spring and autumn. We know of no mineral that acts in that manner, and the only possible explanation seems to be that it is the result of a covering of vegetation.—Youth's Companion.

WHEN REARING CHICKS.

The period of brooding chicks with hens or with artificial brooders depends upon the season of the year. In the early season, or if it is cold or damp during the normal brooding season, the chicks will require to be brooded for a longer time than under normal conditions, which usually lasts from six to ten weeks. After the brooding period is over, that is, when the chicks are old enough and sufficiently well developed to do without heat, the problem of rearing becomes much easier. The rearing of the chicks really includes their care and management from hatching time to maturity. There are various factors in brooding, however, which must be considered separately and so rearing usually includes the treatment of the chicks from the time they are taken from the hen or brooders until they reach maturity.

The direct object in the treatment of the growing stock is to promote normal growth. Uniform development is necessary to insure satisfactory results. Chicks of the same breed vary greatly in size and vitality and it is wise to kill off all weaklings at hatching time. As the chicks develop, the weaker ones should be eliminated from the flock. A rigid system of selection should be carried out from hatching to maturity and all chicks lacking vigor should not be raised. A good time to weed out the weaker chicks is when they are about eight weeks old. These should be placed by themselves and in some cases can be fattened profitably. With the rest of the flock the aim should be to keep them in the best possible state of health and growth.

Little chicks must have plenty of freedom. To thrive well they must be given plenty of range on clean soil. As far as possible avoid raising the chicks on the same ground year after year, since the land on which the chicks are raised continuously without cultivation soon becomes dirty and is liable to cause sickness and disease among the flock.

Overcrowding the chicks on a small area of land will cause much trouble during the growing period. Plenty of range tends to make the chicks more vigorous and will lessen the cost of feeding. When the chicks are allowed to run in the orchard or cultivated fields on the farm they are able to feed on many worms, insects and other food material. They will soon get plenty of green food which is so essential in the successful raising of chicks. The cultivation of the land on which the chicks are being raised tends to keep the soil sweet and clean. Chicks on free range can obtain much mineral food which assists greatly in their proper development.

Growing chicks require plenty of shade. The lack of shade, where chicks are raised on bare ground in small yards, is a very disadvantage. The orchard will supply plenty of shade, or if the orchard is not available the chicks should be raised on land where crops are grown. The corn field makes one of the best places for the young stock.—M. A. Jull.

THE ORPINGTON.

Probably the best and certainly the most popular of all the English breeds of poultry is the Orpington. It has undoubted utility qualities both as a layer and a market fowl. Certain varieties are popular in the United States and will undoubtedly continue so while they give as good results as at present.

The late William Cook, of England originated all the Orpingtons. The Rose Comb is intended for northern latitudes where a bird with a large comb [illegible] and where [illegible] winter [illegible] combs [illegible] are the single combs. For this reason the Rose Comb Orpington is becoming quite popular. This is an easy strain of the Buff Orpington. Many excellent specimens of this variety have been bred and exhibited, and it is gaining more breeders each year.

It is a good layer of large, tinted eggs. The chicks are sturdy and good growers, reaching maturity at a comparatively early age. [illegible] for their size they make excellent table poultry, and as such are much in demand. Females weigh seven to eight and a half to ten pounds. They have rich, golden buff plumage in all sections, white skin and white legs and feet.

NOTES.

The poultry-keeper that does not succeed with his fowls is not always one who does not know about poultry, but does not apply the knowledge he has or can obtain with but little cost. No industry has so much free advice given it, and of late years much of it dependable, written by those who have and are making good. If the beginner will only heed, many failures would possibly be avoided.

The first few years in poultry operation the beginner knows more about the business than he ever will again. After that period he either gets out or commences to really glean the inside facts, and is from that time on seeking knowledge with no more the know-all spirit.

The fancier that neglects the utility side in his flock is taking a step backwards, although the number of such are not in the majority. All realize that good shape and egg production are essentials, and they are, and can be combined with good looks, as past records at the laying contests, experiment stations and in the yards of the owners have proven.

Fertility has been good in most cases and the weather of the past has been good for the growth of the chick. In spite of this there is likely to be no overproduction of poultry this year or for some years to come. Not all the eggs placed under hens, or in the incubators, are fertile, and not all that are fertile hatch. Not all the chicks that hatch live, and not all the chicks that hatch live [illegible] 50 to 60 per cent in the winter time, nor do all the hens lay 180 to 200 eggs in 365 days. These things, ever present, are factors that, as a rule, keep overproduction down.

The brooder heat must be carefully watched this time of the year, when during the day the temperature hovers around 70 to 80 and at night 50 to 60, and sometimes as low as 35. To avoid chilling or overheating means a close watch on the weather.

When those beginning in poultry look at it in the same light as any other line of business and less in the light of a snap with big profits and little work there will be fewer failures. To succeed with poultry, especially on a large scale, means work and the use of the brain. There is no easy quick way to riches in the poultry business, or any other line, for that matter. There is as big a profit for the money invested, if properly invested, as in any other line, and more than a good many other business ventures, but it means proper management to attain results.

Poor poultry feed is causing much loss this year. Even in the so-called better grades the quality seems to be lower than in time when feed prices were normal. The bran that keeps a uniform quality each year is the one that will find many friends who will pay even a few cents more and be sure of its quality. Poor poor feed, if not causing a direct loss in chicks, does not properly develop them, which means loss in the end. The poultry keeper should receive what he pays for which he surely does not in many cases.

"DER TAG" IS DUE

German Fleet Eventually to Make Desperate Dash for the High Seas.

Stress from many angles will soon force the German fleet into the open where she will be engaged by the impatient British dreadnoughts, and "der tag" so ardently longed for by the Teuton will become a stern reality.

Outnumbered two to one by the fleets of Great Britain alone, not to mention France and Russia, together with the war craft of the smaller nations at war, the doom of her navy seems sealed.

"Der Tag" shall be in truth "that day," and English guns will wipe the insult out, and school the Teuton in international etiquette.

When the Union Jack will be snapping at the masthead of the flagship of the British squadron on that day, will it also be flying from the front of your home?

With these thoughts uppermost, the Times has provided complete flag outfits for all loyal Canadian readers of these columns as announced in another page of to-day's issue, and plan under which they are presented brings them to the hands of readers practically without cost, the small financial remuneration asked being just sufficient to defray the assembling and distributing expense.

Be prepared to show your colors when victory perches on our banner—better still, get the flag to-day and adorn the front of your home with your national emblem.

The Way of Mothers.

I've tucked him under the blankets,
I've smoothed the flickering light—
His gaping [illegible] and stared
As I said, "My son, good night."
To-morrow and to-morrow,
I'll come, but he will have flown—
To-morrow and to-morrow
I'll rock by the hearth alone!

I've kissed his wee little bruises,
I've buttoned his round-collared shirt,
Taught him the tales of the gnomes and elves,
And bound his baby hurts.
I've watched beside his cradle
When the fevers raged and burned—
And stood with God at the turning,
Where the bigger things are learned.

And now the nesting is over,
He aches for the spread of his wings;
Aches for his chance—his bitter chance
To learn the bigger things;
And 'way out there who'll soothe him,
So helpless they are—our men—
I'll go once more while he's sleeping
And tuck him in again.

TORTURE OF GAS POISON

Awful Sufferings of Soldier Victims of German Crime.

Hopeless, Helpless Struggle Against Slow Drowning.

A professor of chemistry writes to the Journal de Geneve that the Germany supply of Chilean nitrates was exhausted at the end of March, but that the exploitation of the Ostwald process for the extraction of azotic acid from ammoniac enables explosives to be produced in abundance.

The professor affirms that the asphyxiating gases used at Ypres were not bromine but oxides of azote, which are obtainable cheaply and in unlimited quantities by the Ostwald process.

They are easily liquefied, of a brown color, heavier than air, and have effects similar to those reported.—Central News.

A grim account of a visit to a hospital where the men who have been "gassed" are under treatment is given a British officer, who complains that the world does not realize the diabolical nature of these tactics. He says:

When we got to the hospital we had no difficulty in finding out in which ward the men were, as the noise of the poor fellows trying to get breath was sufficient to direct us. There were about twenty of the worst cases in the ward, on mattresses, all more or less in a sitting position, propped up against the walls.

Their faces, arms, hands were of a shiny grey-black color. With mouths open and lead-glazed eyes, they were all swaying slightly backwards and forwards trying to get breath. It was a most appalling sight, all these poor black faces, struggling, struggling for life, what with the groaning and noise of the effort for breath.

There is practically nothing to be done for them, except to give them salt and water to try to make them sick.

The effect the gas has is to fill the lungs with a watery, frothy matter, which gradually increases and rises till it fills up the whole lungs and comes up to the mouth; then they die. It is suffocation; slow drowning, taking in some cases one or two days.

We have lost hundreds of men who died in the trenches, and over half the men who reached hospital have died. Eight died last night out of the twenty I saw, and most of the others I saw will die; while those who get over the gas invariably develop acute pneumonia.

It is without doubt the most awful form of scientific torture. Not one of the men I saw in hospital had a scratch or wound.

The nurses and doctors were all working their utmost against this terror; but one could see from the tension of their nerves that it was like fighting a hidden danger which was overtaking every one.

The Germans have given out that it is a rapid, painless death. The liars! No torture could be worse than to give them a dose of their own gas.

When Repainting Remember

Never paint over a dirty or greasy surface.

Before painting any surface be sure to remove all dust or dirt.

Before applying the second coat of paint carefully putty all nail holes, cracks, etc.

Do not add dryers or japans to hasten the drying. They are injurious to the paint.

The last coat should be thinned, if any thinning is necessary, with pure raw linseed oil only.

Never paint in frosty weather or over a glossy surface. Under such conditions paint will crawl and not dry properly.

Old paint which has peeled or become badly cracked should be burned off or removed with some standard paint and varnish remover.

Do not try to paint over a wet surface, or in damp or foggy weather. Moisture frequently causes blistering, cracking, scaling and similar troubles.

Plaster, brick or stone work, on account of absorption, should be sized or primed with a coat of special primer, prepared for the purpose.

If some old paint is hard and smooth, the new paint will not penetrate or adhere, and the surface should therefore be made rough with coarse sandpaper.

Always stir the contents of the can well before using; in fact, the paint should be poured out of one can into another and thus thoroughly mixed. This is important.

Imperial Rome.

There are various estimates of the population of ancient Rome. The figure given by Gibbon is 1,200,000. Baker, in his notes to Montesquieu's "Grandeur and Decadence of the Romans," gives good reasons for thinking that Rome's population was 2,000,000. The city had within its walls in the time of Theodosius 48,382 habitations, built, as a rule, with several stories.—New York American.

A clothesline may be nicely cleaned by wrapping it around a washboard and thoroughly scrubbing it in soapsuds.

Acetic acid will remove warts. Touch the wart with the acid, using a toothpick for the purpose.

A raw potato is a good remedy for burns. Grate the potato and apply it like a poultice.

In blacking a stove, wet blacking brush in warm water, rub on a little soap, then blacking, and apply to stove. It will last longer, remove grease and prevent rusting. Have the stove slightly warm.

Before washing new goods, always soak over night in strong salt water, to set the color.

Keep plenty of paper towels in the kitchen. They are nice for wiping fish and fowls. Then they can be thrown away immediately, which saves the dishtowels, with the ill-smelling linen waiting for the laundry.

Place good-sized sprays of mint in a glass fruit jar. Keep the jar filled with water and the mint will grow as well as in a window box or in a kitchen garden.

Dim, rusty curtain hooks may be renewed by soaking them in vinegar over night.

If the clothes are yellow a tablespoonful of peroxide of hydrogen put in the water in which they soaked will bleach them.

Clean tarnished silver with a paste made of mixing whiting with water and a few drops of ammonia. Apply this to the silver and, when it is dry, brush with a jeweler's brush. Wash in warm suds, rinse and polish.

SERVIA'S NAME

And That Nation's Request That it be Spelled Serbia.

The request of the nation heretofore known in western Europe as "Servia" that its name be hereafter spelled "Serbia" is only reasonable, "Serbia" or "Serbya" being the correct form.

The letter "v" is a comparatively late comer into alphabets. The Greek has none; "b" is used instead. "Victoria" thus becomes "Bictoria," but is pronounced the same.

Old Slavonic, whence Russian and the Serbian dialect are derived, had no "v," but two forms of "b," one denoting the "v" sound. Early Latin also used "b" for "v," as does modern Spanish, and unlettered persons long continued to confuse the letters. Thus a Christian father would carve on a rude stone in the Catacombs for his baby daughter, "Birgo," instead of "Virgo"—virgin. In modern Italian dialects "v" and "b" are to some extent interchangeable.

English writers have often used "Serb" to distinguish the entire race from "Servian," a subject of the little kingdom. In the native tongue there is only the one word. It is often hard to preserve in English letters the exact Serbian form of a word. The adjective "Serbian" itself looks much like "Crpsk." And the word is sometimes spelled with an "o" in English—Sorb.—New York World.

"I have three jobs," replied Mr. Curran. "I am studying law, I am a newspaper reporter, and I am selling life insurance."

"How do you manage to get it all in?" said the friend.

HEALTH GIVING OZONE.

Its Process of Formation and the Way It Attacks Microbes.

The pungent, bracing effect of mountain air is largely due to the presence of great quantities of ozone. Everyone knows this and learnedly talks about the ozone in the air, but very few people have the slightest idea of what they are really talking about.

Nature makes ozone by allowing the ultraviolet rays of the sun to act upon the oxygen of the air. Briefly, ozone is a particularly active form of oxygen. A molecule of oxygen is composed of two atoms, whereas ozone is composed of three.

As only two elements of oxygen can exist together, the addition of the third sets up a disturbance, which causes it to detach itself from the other two. Being thus detached, the third atom, which is now ozone, wandering around by itself, gravitates with great sureness and rapidity to any bit of foul air or any microbe which may be lurking in the vicinity, for the attraction between ozone and microbes is irresistible.

Like most fatal passions, the outcome is tragic, for the ozone burns up the microbes as soon as they touch each other. This is the reason that ozone is health giving: it may be truly said to eat up disease.—Detroit Free Press.

A FINE COMPLEXION

May Be Had Through the Rich, Red Blood Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Actually Make.

A girl's complexion is something more than a matter to concern her vanity. It is an indication of the state of her health. Pallor in a growing girl means a thinning of the blood. Parents should be watchful of their daughter's complexions and should see to it that these danger signs are corrected. When a girl in her teens becomes pale and sallow, if she shows an inclination to tire easily, is listless and inattentive to her work or studies, she needs Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, a tonic which directly and specifically corrects the condition from which she is suffering. A chemical analysis of the blood of such a girl would show it to be deficient in just the elements that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills can supply, and which restore brightness to the eye and color to the cheeks. Miss Delina Arsenault, Urbainville, P. E. I., is one of the thousands of anaemic girls restored to health by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says: "I was attacked with anaemia, and was in such a miserable condition that I had to consult a doctor, and was under his care for several months, but without getting better. I was growing thinner every day, had dark circles around the eyes. I could hardly sleep at night, but tossed restlessly and got up in the morning with black anticipation of the day's miseries before me. I was always bothered with headaches and pains in the back and limbs. My appetite was poor and I frequently vomited what I did eat. My friends feared that I would not recover. I had often seen Dr. Williams' Pink Pills advertised, and finally decided to try them. I used altogether nine boxes and they made me as well as ever I was in my life. All the pains and aches disappeared; my appetite returned. I could sleep soundly at night, and the color returned to my cheeks. I also gained seventeen pounds in weight. I am now always well, and for this happy condition I have to thank Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

You can get these Pills from any dealer in medicine or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Wigwag—I saw the sun rise this morning. Guzzler—Gee! I didn't get to bed till pretty late myself, but you've got one on me there.

STEPHAN BROS.

PINKERTON

Mr. George Scott was in the vicinity with his sawing machine last week.

Quite a number from the village spent the holiday last week at a picnic at Thompson's bridge, south of Chepstow. The garden party at Eden Grove was well patronized also.

We learn that Miss Me[illegible] Donnelly daughter of Senator Donnelly, has carried off four medals in the recent examinations in Loretto Abbey, Toronto. While Pinkerton does not occupy a very conspicuous place on the map it is seldom among the outboard of places when the results of the examinations are announced.

Mr. Thomas Baird is in Kingston this week attending the general assembly of the Pres. church.

Mrs. Houston, of Paisley, is visiting at her son's Mr. Thos Houston on the 12th con.

Anniversary services are being held in the Pres. church here on Sunday June 13th. Rev. G. B. McLennan B. A., of Yorkton, Sask., will conduct the morning and evening services.

Now a Luxury of the Rich.

In commenting upon the closing of a butcher shop last week a butcher informed The Echo that there are not one half of the number of beef cattle slaughtered for use in this town now that there were a few years ago. He attributes the whole reason to the high cost of beef. Then a sirloin roast was within the reach of everyone, but today it is the luxury of the rich.—Wiarton Echo.

Case Dismissed.

James Hayden of Wingham was up before Magistrates Brink, [illegible] and Richardson on Monday charged with being in an intoxicated condition in the Municipality of Teeswater on Sunday May 16. Otto Klein appeared for the prosecution while the defendant had no lawyer. The evidence against him was not strong enough to warrant conviction and the case was dismissed.—Teeswater News.

Kinloss Stage Quits.

The Lucknow-Kinloss stage, a standing feature of the north Gravel Road traffic since pioneer days, made its last trip on Saturday, May 22—another victim of the new order of things. The passenger and parcel business of the stage lines in Old Ontario have long been a small factor in the business and when the mail carrying contract was cut off, they quit at once. The territory about Kinloss postoffice is now served by the rural routes out from Holyrood.

It is said that automobiles are selling more readily this season than almost anything else. That doesn't sound like hard times. Certainly more are being bought in this part of Ontario than ever before. They have become so common that, in buying, even the prudent man does not feel that he is doing an extravagant thing.

Merchants Bank Statement

With public liabilities amounting, at the end of the fiscal year, April 30th, 1915 to $71,780,000 or three millions greater than in the year previous, the Merchants Bank of Canada this year reports a total of cash and liquid assets amounting to $[illegible],421,571, or over eight millions greater than in 1914. This means that the liquid assets are no less than 16 per cent of the public liabilities, an almost unprecedented condition of strength, the significance of which can be realized on considering that last year's normal ratio was only 50 per cent. In a word the Merchants Bank and its depositors are able to contemplate the utmost possibilities of the difficult and uncertain period with complete equanimity, and at the same time the shareholders can look forward to a large increase in the bank's activity and profits when normal conditions are restored, as a result of its present strength. A further notable point about these liquid assets is the exceptionally large proportion of actual cash, the items of current coin and Dominion notes alone total $15,125,917, or twice what they were a year ago. The profits for the year naturally show a considerable reduction as the result of this sustained and vigorous effort to keep the assets strong. Net banking profits were $995,191 for the year, against $1,218,[illegible] on the same capital last year, and further deductions were made from the profit-loss-account for patriotic donations, taxes and depreciation—the latter a loss which will doubtless be recovered in part in future years. It is worthy of note that the items relating to delinquent debtors are so small as to be negligible. Real estate and overdue debts together only total $[illegible]. The growth of the business (time deposits are over four millions larger) shows the great confidence which the Bank enjoys among Canadian Depositors.

Baptist Association.

The 28th annual meeting of the Walkerton Association of Baptist Churches is being held in Mt Forest this week. Mr. J. T. Kirkwood, of Tiverton, moderator, is presiding. Mr. J. J. Cook is officiating as clerk, and Mr. F. Ernest Rachel has been busy as chairman of the billeting committee in arranging for entertainment for the large number of delegates present. The meeting on Tuesday afternoon was a pastor's conference, opening with devotional exercises led by the Rev. J. K. Fairful of Clinton. Rev. T. E. Meldrum, B. A., of Palmerston gave an address on "What constitutes Real Success in Church Work," discussion being led by the Rev. G. C. Rock, of Walkerton. Another address on "How to develop the grace of Christian Stewardship in our Churches" was given by the Rev. R. Marshall, and a profitable discussion ensued led by the Rev. L. H. Cole, of Monch. The conference was helpful and stimulating and participated in by fifteen or twenty clergymen. The evening gathering was a ladies meeting. There was a large attendance and the proceedings most interesting. The opening exercises were led by the President, Mrs. J. J. Cook. Miss Ruby Stovel read the Directors' Report. A nicely expressed address of welcome was given by Mrs. J. T. Allen, to which Mrs. G. C. Rock of Walkerton replied in fitting terms. Music was rendered by the choir and solos were sung by Miss Grace Wright and Mrs. J. C. Dingman. Mrs J. Firstbrook, of Toronto, gave a splendid address on foreign Missions, impressing all by both her matter and personality. Mr. and Mrs. Firstbrook, with a brother, Mr. Ryrie, and Mrs. Ryrie, of Toronto, had made a special study of missions in a tour around the world. Mrs. Firstbrook said that in the mission fields a person was not asked whether he were a Presbyterian or a Methodist or a Baptist, but if he were a Christian. Petty differences were forgotten in the great issue. Mr. M. J. Andoff, of Toronto, gave an interesting address on home missions, especially with regard to his work among foreigners in Toronto. As Mr. Andoff is a Macedonian, he has first-hand knowledge of the conditions in South-western Europe. The sessions are being continued till this evening and the public are especially invited to the evening meetings. Dr. Kerstead, of McMaster University, was to speak Wednesday evening on the war, and Rev. D. Norton this (Thursday) evening on Home Missions.

Cor.-Sec.-Treas.	Mrs Dixon.
Rec. Sec.	Miss Ross.
Auditors	Messrs. Robertson and Benton.

Dollar Day, a Winner.

Hanover's first Dollar Day was held yesterday, and in the main it was a decided success. A large crowd of shoppers were out from town and country—many coming from a distance—and they were greatly pleased with their purchases. Merchants seen by The Post last evening expressed themselves as well pleased with the try out of Dollar Day, and it will likely become an annual affair here.—Hanover Post.

The Telescope urged some time ago that the merchants of Walkerton observe a Dollar Day, but as the local merchants take to a new idea, something like a wild beast does to his cage in the zoo, with fear and trembling, they declined to do so. What we need in Walkerton is a great deal more optimism and considerably less pessimism.

To Train Here?

A rumor has been in circulation during the past few days to the effect that a battalion of Canada's new army of 5000 men, were to be recruited and trained in Walkerton. The local military authorities are very reticent with regard to the matter and in answer to the query, merely stated that nothing definite had yet been arranged.

Who Left the Lemons?

Early in the week a customer who called at this office, left a bag of lemons on the counter. We do not mind having lemons handed to us one at a time, but when it comes to taking them by the bag, we object and would be pleased if the owner would call and remove the fruit at once, else, we will have to place them in the safe to safeguard them from the staff who have suddenly taken a liking for lemonade.

Rev. Dean Kelly to Arthur.

Rev. Dean Kelly (who was at one time parish priest at the R. C. Church here but who, of late years, has been stationed at Mount Forest, has been moved, by Bishop Dowling, to be Dean of Arthur and pastor of the parish. In commenting on Rev. Dean Kelly's removal, the Mount Forest Confederate says:—

> Rev. Dean Kelly has made many friends here during his pastorate of seven years, and is best known for his quiet, retiring, kindly ways and the faithful discharge of his priestly duties

Arrested as Vagrant.

Mr. James Halliday of Greenock laid an information against his granddaughter, Ethel Halliday, charging her with vagrancy and she was arrested on Monday by Chief Ferguson. She appeared before Magistrates Tolton and Richardson and was dismissed, there being no evidence to substantiate the charge. The girl, it appears had refused to live with her grand parent and he took this course, thinking he could retain her to conduct his household. The court, however, took a different view and besides dismissing the case, ordered him to pay all costs.

Indian Lister Fined.

Mr. Frank Yarck was arrested on Saturday last and lodged in gaol on a charge of being drunk while on the prohibitory list. He appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Monday and was fined $10 and costs. Yarck claimed that he secured his booze at the brewery when no one was about, but those interested are inclined to disbelieve this story. If it is true and the manager or employees of the brewery are not implicated in Yarck's getting intoxicated, will the brewery people lay a charge of theft against him as probably should be done under such circumstances.

Married at Norval, Ont.

The marriage took place at Norval, Ont., on Wednesday of this week, of a former popular Walkerton young lady, in the person of Miss Nellie Guinn, daughter of the late Richard Guinn, to Mr. Percival Worthington. After the ceremony, which was performed at the home the bride's sister, Mrs. Switzer, the young couple left on a wedding trip to New York, on their return from which they will take up their residence in Guelph where the groom conducts a butcher business. Both Mr. and Mrs. Worthington are well known in Walkerton and their many friends will extend their best wishes for every happiness in their new sphere of life.

Granted Naturalization Papers.

Rev. Mosig pastor of the Walkerton Lutheran church, was granted his naturalization papers by Judge Klein on Saturday afternoon. Rev. Mosig who was born in Germany and who has lived in Canada for ten years applied for his papers last week at the sessions, but was refused, on objection being made by Mr. W. J. McNally, who asked that an investigation be made before the clergyman's request be granted. This was done and he appeared for a hearing on Saturday. From the evidence produced, that the many stories circulated as to Mr. Mosig's conduct, have been greatly exaggerated and a decidedly biased view taken of some statements which he made. After hearing the evidence Judge Klein stated that he was entirely in sympathy with Mr. McNally and complimented him in the action he had taken in the matter, but said that there was nothing in the evidence to corroborate the stories which had been circulated and therefore he granted the naturalization papers to Mr. Mosig and welcomed him as British subject and a naturalized citizen of Canada.

Daughters of the Empire.

The regular meeting of the Walkerton Chapter I.O.D.E. will be held in the armouries on Saturday, June 19th, at 3.30 p.m.

Arrested on Monday.

Peter Hawley was arrested near Paisley on Monday morning by constable Briggs under a bench warrant issued by Judge Klein at the general session last week. Hawley purchased a watch last March from Robt. Gibson besides borrowing $1.00 from him and giving him a cheque for which there were no funds in the bank. He was given time to pay for the watch and costs, failing in which he was arrested. Hawley had $20.00 which the Judge ordered to be applied to the payment of his indebtedness and he was released for another month to make up the balance.

Smith did not Appear.

Messrs. N. A. Wilford, Wm George, A. S. Royce and Jos. Lindsay were in Toronto on Thursday last, having been summoned to testify in the court case of the G.T.R. and St. Lawrence Sugar Co'y against A. J. Smith a former merchant of Walkerton. Smith it appears refused to pay for ten bags of sugar valued at $53.00 which were shipped to him while he was in business here, claiming he did not receive them. The G.T.R. and the Sugar Company had secured evidence that the sugar had been delivered to Smith consequently the defendant did not put in an appearance at the court and the plaintiffs were awarded the verdict with costs. Besides paying for the sugar, Smith will pay costs amounting to over $50.

Should be Stopped.

Sunday evening appears to be a favorite time for a number of boys to gather at the court-yard for recreation. There is no objection to the youths being there if they keep within the bounds of Sabbath quietude, but very frequently, by their noisy behavior and hilarity they disturb the services in the nearby churches and make it uncomfortable not only for the speaker, but also for those who are endeavoring to listen to his discourse. There is the old saying, "boys will be boys," but nevertheless boys should also be young gentlemen and therefore should be more considerate of the Sabbath Day, particularly when they realize that by being noisy they are liable to disturb the peacefulness of any household, church or community.

Farmers Institute Picnic.

The annual meeting of the South Bruce Farmer's Institute will be held at Mr. Abram Rowand's, Brant a mile north of Walkerton on SATURDAY JUNE 26th, commencing at 2 o'clock, when the report of the Executive, Auditors, points at which meetings are to be held next year, election of Directors, Auditors, and all other business, including plans for the reorganization of the Institute will be considered and disposed of. Prof. Geo. E. Day of the O. A. C., Guelph will address the meeting: subjects "Cattle Dressing." It is to be hoped that all members and their friends will be present and make this annual farmers' picnic a pleasant and enjoyable one. The ladies will provide lunch as usual. The District Meeting of the South Bruce Women's Institute will be held at the same place and time.

Rudolph vs Wench

This suit for slander together with a counter action for the recovery of a steer was heard at the June Sessions at the court house last week, before Judge Widdifield of Owen Sound. Messrs Rudolph and Wench are neighbors living in the vicinity of Paisley and it appears that last year, in the summer months, their cattle became mixed in the pasture field and when they endeavored to separate them both claimed a large steer while a small animal was left ownerless. Naturally a controversy arose and the enmity became so great, that Rudolph entered an action for slander against Wench and the latter entered a counter suit for the recovery of the steer. There were a great many witnesses called and the hearing of the case took two and a half days. The court dismissed the slander action and gave the steer to Rudolph, ordering each party to pay his own costs. The small steer which was unclaimed will be disposed of by auction, the proceeds to go to the township.

Bought Dodge Car.

Mr. Chas. Kolpin, the local agent for the Dodge car has sold one of these 1915 models to Dr. W. A. Hall. Dr. Hall, who bought a Ford car early in the season has disposed of the car to Mr. Chas. Tanner of the South Line, Brant.

Death of Mrs. Garland.

A gloom such as is seldom experienced in any neighborhood was cast over the entire community on Saturday morning when it became known that Mrs. Cecil Garland had passed away after a few days illness. The deceased, whose maiden name was Katharine Thompson, was of a particularly sunny disposition and was beloved by all who knew her. Of deep religious convictions she had prior to her marriage taken a prominent part in Sabbath School service in the Pres. church, Glamis, of which church she was a member. The funeral service which was held in the Pres. church was conducted by Rev. Peter Reith of Glamis, assisted by Rev. R. M. Gale of Pinkerton, and the very large attendance indicated in what general esteem the deceased was held. Interment took place in Purdy's cemetery. The heartfelt sympathy of the entire community is extended to the bereaved husband and infant son, and to the sorrowing father, mother, and family of the deceased.—(From Pinkerton correspondence.

Regret the Dismissal.

The following is one of the motions adopted at the last meeting of the council of the township of Greenock. We merely quote it to show the feeling which exists not only in Greenock township, but in all the minor municipalities in the County of Bruce with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Geo D. McKay, former Deputy Registrar:—

> Campbell—Collison—That the municipal council of the township of Greenock wishes to express its regret at the change in the registry office wherein the former deputy registrar, Geo. D. McKay, has been removed from his position by the present registrar, W. H. McFarlane. For many years the relationship by this township with the office has been under the careful direction of Mr. McKay. Our property owners, real estate investors and mortgagees have always depended upon the judgement and guidance of Mr. McKay in their many transactions and in his reports upon the properties in question. We regret very much that Mr. McKay has been removed from his position. As he has been a valuable assistant to the rate payers and property owners of this township, we hope that the government will take up the matter and arrange so that Mr. McKay will still continue to be a guide and assistance to the property owners of this municipality.—Carried.

CAPTAIN McNALLY WRITES.

The following is a part of a letter written by Capt. McNally, who is now in a hospital in London, England, to his father and which was received here on Tuesday. Space will not permit us to publish the first part of the letter which was a detailed explanation of the situation and operations of the 7th Battalion of which he was a member.

Another letter written June 14, which arrived on the same boat stated that X-ray plates of the Captain's wound disclosed the fact that there is a piece of shrapnel about half an inch square still in his wound, about an inch above the thigh bone. As it would be difficult to remove, the doctors have decided to leave it there.

Viscountess Victoria Ridley's Hospital
10 Carlton House Terrace W.,
London, May 30th, 1915

Dear Dad:—

We went to see what could be done to regain communication with the front trench. By crawling along the communication trench I was fairly safe from shrapnel which is less dangerous the closer you get to the ground. I must admit and I was rather surprised afterwards that I did not have the slightest sick feeling when I found myself crawling through a mass of German bodies, arms, limbs, legs, etc., the result of the bombing of a few hours before. I reached the gap and decided that it was possible to dig through to the trench if our artillery would give the Germans something to think about. Word was sent to the artillery and a Canadian battery which had taken a position scarcely more than 100 yards from us let go. We got a number of men with shovels and got to work. The rest were ordered to dig themselves in as the main trench itself was full and all the wounded who could get along were crawling to the rear. The German artillery observers must have seen us sending the men into the communication trench to dig through the gap and the men themselves were rather careless, not taking care to keep low enough. Soon the juncture of the communication trench and the main trench where I was supervising became a perfect little h—l. Shrapnel, containing iron, tin, broken glass, etc., began to explode around us. During the heavier shelling I stayed

A GIFT OF A SOUL

At this plain statement of facts a sudden anger was kindled in his heart against the innocent girl, whose interests were so directly opposed to his own that what was advantageous to him was fatal to her, and that it seemed impossible to make the brother live without causing the death of the sister. A fantastic idea presented itself to his mind, symbolizing their destinies under the colors of the cards, red and black—the one the color of blood, the other the color of mourning. If red turned up Juliette was to die; if black, he must fall back into his previous state of suffering.

A frenzy of selfishness seized upon him, and all his energies were concentrated in the desperate desire for life. He felt himself capable of anything to preserve it—even a crime. He carried his baseness so far as to raise his eyes to the sick girl, walking pensively in the garden, and to say to himself with fiendish satisfaction: "Two months ago it was I who dragged myself along that sunny walk, and I am now strong and able to enjoy life. All my regrets, all my complaints, which then seemed so unavailing, I may now cast to the winds, and indulge without restraint my desires and my hopes. All that I came so near losing I have regained. Life surges triumphantly within me, what matters the price I have paid for it!"

His conscience was silent. No voice rose up within him to protest against this monstrous deification of self. His heart was dumb, his mind was closed to every generous thought. No feeling within him rebelled against this horrible absolution which he gave himself for all the evil his useless existence had caused, and was yet to cause.

Yet in the midst of this moral insensibility a few words uttered by his mother caused him to tremble.

"I believe," she said, "that Juliette loved Pierre Laurier in secret. I have not dared to question her, fearing to hear her answer in the affirmative. For I could give her no consolation, and what can there be more cruel for a mother than to see her child grieving without being able to hold out to her a ray of hope? Yet if this be the case we ought to know it, for, here, perhaps, is the wound we must seek to heal."

Jacques felt as if a power which he could not resist impelled him to try to clear up this painful mystery. Everything relating to his friend's death had a terrifying effect upon him, yet he felt attracted to the subject with invincible curiosity; he desired and, at the same time, feared to know the truth. He wished to be silent, yet he could not forbear saying:

"What if I were to speak to her? She might confide her secret to me."

"Question her very gently, then, and if she seems reluctant, do not urge her to answer. Leave her at liberty to keep her secret."

"Have no fear."

Juliette was approaching. Mme. de Vignes made a last mute appeal to Jacques' tenderness and compassion for his young sister, and went into the house.

The young girl, raising her eyes, saw her brother standing before her as if waiting for her. Her countenance lighted up, and a flush mounted to her cheeks. She seemed transformed, and the Juliette of the past, happy, gay and blooming, reappeared for an instant. But her brow clouded over again, her features relaxed, her mouth lost its smile, and she was once more grave and sad, as usual. Of her own accord she took her brother's arm, and leaning on it with evident pleasure,—

"You are now entirely well, my dear Jacques," she said.

He nodded affirmatively, pressing Juliette's hand gently at the same time.

"What a joy it is not to see you any longer sick and unhappy," she continued; "for you did not bear your illness with patience; you were not disposed to be resigned."

She shook her head gently, as if to say: "Women are more courageous; they bear suffering better." They had reached the very spot in the veranda in front of the house where Davidoff had announced to Jacques the death of Pierre Laurier. The window of the drawing-room, concealed by the blinds, was now as then half open, but Juliette was no longer on the watch for evil tidings. She knew her fate, and she awaited only the end of her sufferings. But no one on earth could give it to her. This deliverance must come to her from heaven. She seated herself, tranquil and indifferent, in one of the willow chairs, and fixed her gaze on the sea. "I must question her," said Jacques to himself. "What shall I say to her, and how begin the conversation? Her little head is so clear! She will weigh each one of my words and guess from them the meaning of my questions. The slightest blunder would put her on her guard. And if she mistrusts me in the least I shall get nothing from her. Her lips will be sealed."

"Here we are in the middle of March," he began with a meditative air. "We must soon return to Paris. Will you not be sorry to leave this place, dear?"

"It matters little to me where I am," she answered indifferently, as if she thought to herself, "There is but one place where I can be at rest,—in the peaceful and silent tomb."

"I had fancied our departure would not please you, that perhaps it might grieve you, and I was going to ask our mother to stay here a few weeks longer."

She bent her head with a frown, and seemed determined to betray nothing of her thoughts. Her brother watched her with attention, in the hope of intercepting a quicker throb than usual of this poor wounded heart.

"As for me," he pursued, "I should not have been sorry to remain here longer. I shall leave this place with regret, for I am bound to it by a most painful tie."

His voice failed him. He could never mention Laurier's name without a secret shudder, as if he felt he himself were in some way accountable for his tragic fate.

"Here I lost my dearest friend," he resumed, "a loss for which I can never be consoled. I fancy that in leaving this place I shall be going farther away from him; although I know not where his last resting-place is, since the waves have not given him back to us, and we have not been permitted the supreme consolation of saying a last prayer over his remains. This spot, where I saw him for the last time, has a fascination for me, as if I had a secret hope that I should see him one day reappear."

At these words Juliette trembled, and she raised her eyes to her brother's with a questioning look. She felt a movement of joy, quickly repressed, however.

"Do you think it possible, then, that he is not dead?" she asked.

"His body has never been recovered," he answered in a hollow voice.

"And is he, alas! the only one that the jealous sea has refused to give up," cried the young girl, with a heart-rending look. "No! we ought not to cherish any illusions, or lull ourselves with false hopes. He had lost faith in the future, he had lost confidence in his friends, life had ceased to possess any attraction for him. Our loss is certain, irreparable. We shall never see him again! He has left us forever. We shall never again hear his voice, nor his laughter nor even his complaints. He has gone to the land from which no one returns and we may weep for him without any fear of our tears being causelessly shed."

She spoke with increasing agitation, and her grief, no longer restrained, overflowed from her heart to her lips like a torrent, swollen by a sudden rainstorm. Surprised, Jacques looked at his sister, seeking to discover, in the midst of the bitterness of the grief, which she expressed, some trace of a reproach addressed to himself.

"Does she suspect the terrible secret?" he asked himself. "If she had to decide between Pierre and me, which would she choose? Would she sacrifice her brother or her lover?"

Juliette wiped away the tears which flowed down her cheeks, and remained silent a moment; then she said.

"Heaven, in compensation, has delivered us from our anxiety in regard to your health. Enjoy life, Jacques, employ it in loving us dearly."

She made a movement as if to go. He detained her, and looking at her fixedly said:

"This, then, is the secret of your illness and your dejection. You loved him."

She answered without hesitation and without embarrassment

"With all my soul. [illegible] my mother and you he was the only one who occupied my thoughts."

"You are not yet twenty. At your age there is no sorrow which is eternal. The future is still before you."

She bowed her head dejectedly; then said with great sweetness:

"Promise me never to speak on this subject again, will you? It would only cause me useless suffering. I am not one of those who can forget their sorrows, or be consoled by them. In the secret depths of my heart, the memory of Pierre will be the object of my worship. I shall think ceaselessly of him, but to hear his name uttered is more than I can bear. I promise you on my part, to take care of myself and to neglect nothing that might contribute to my health. I do not wish to distress you, nor cause you anxiety; but leave me at liberty to indulge my grief."

She smiled sweetly at her brother, and resumed her solitary walk up and down the terrace.

Much affected, Jacques entered the house and went up to his mother's room. Madame de Vignes was anxiously waiting for him.

"Well?" she asked, as soon as she saw him enter.

"Well, I have spoken to her as we agreed, and I found her, if not reasonable, at least very calm. She grieves deeply and does not wish to be consoled. I had thought that a prolongation of our stay here might be beneficial to her, but I was mistaken. I think the best course to take would be to return to Paris at once, and make the child resume her former way of living. Solitude is not good for her. She has too much time in which to let her thoughts dwell on the one theme. Our friends will take possession of her. She will be diverted in spite of herself and this will have a favorable effect on her spirits, I hope."

"Do you think it would be well to make preparations for our departure at once, then?"

"No, that would seem too sudden. In a couple of weeks we might go."

"But you, my dear boy, would not the change of climate be prejudicial to you? We are still in March, in Paris it is still cold."

"No matter! My health is now excellent, and it is of Juliette alone that we must think."

"Very well, I will do as you advise then."

Jacques kissed his mother's hand tenderly. The breakfast bell rang and they went into the dining-room, where Juliette soon joined them. Mme. de Vignes and her son spoke on indifferent subjects. Juliette was silent. The repast was a short one. A restraint seemed to weigh upon them all, and each wished to be alone. As soon as the meal was over they rose. The mother and daughter returned to their rooms in silence. Jacques lighted a cigar and went to take a solitary walk on the seashore.

In an indentation of the coast bordered by red rocks, the tide ebbed and flowed, forming a little creek. Vegetation stopped at the edge of the water, but on the sand mosses of a greyish-green color, resembling lichens, grew vigorously. Jacques seated himself here, and soothed by the delicious mildness of the sunshine fell into a reverie. Silence and solitude reigned around. Immensity of space was before him, and above him. The sea and the sky met, blending imperceptibly together in the blue distance. Jacques' eyes fixed upon the far horizon, were dazzled by the clear brightness of the atmosphere, and fascinated by the monotonous motion of the waves.

Little by little the scene before him faded from his view and he saw again the ball room as on the night of the veglione. He heard again the noise of the crowd, the stamping of the dancers on the floor, and the strains of the orchestra. He saw pictured before him the whole scene of the evening of the Carnival, and among the promenaders he could distinguish through the white domino. She smiled seductively under the lace of her mask and her eyes glittered like diamonds through the apertures in the satin. The subtle and penetrating odor which emanated from her enslaved Jacques, and in this solitary spot he had so lively a sense of the proximity of the fascinating woman that he stretched out his arms vaguely as if to embrace her. The spell of the vision was broken, and he found himself once more alone. A feeling of irritation took possession of him at the thought that he should be haunted thus by the remembrance of Clemence, that she should have such power over him, that he could not abandon himself to his thoughts for a moment without being at the mercy of this sorceress. She had said to him, "Whether you wish it or not." It was in vain for him to try to resist her. He felt that she had woven her toils around him, triumphant and perfidious, the mistress of his thoughts and of his heart, and the despotic sovereign of his will. He asked himself why he resisted her, why he had an instinctive repugnance or rather fear of her. He knew she was dangerous, all who had approached her had suffered through her. And yet how beautiful she was, with her red lips, her velvety eyes, her divine form! What had he to fear? The remembrance of Pierre came to him. Had she not also loved him, the great artist? And with the same love of change which made it impossible for her to be constant to any one, had she not soon grown tired of him and cast him off? For her he had allowed the exquisite flower of his genius to wither. Like a high-mettled horse harnessed to a heavy load he had worked in order to earn money, to heap gifts upon her, and when he could no longer work, he had tried to win at play what his genius, strained and enervated, could no longer procure. All the various stages in the miserable story of Laurier's passion were known to Jacques. He had seen the painter pass through them one by one, in his lucid moments full of shame and exasperation at his folly, but ready to return to his bondage the moment the woman, at once hated and adored, beckoned to him with her rosy finger or let fall a word of tenderness. What was there, then, so satanic or so divine in this creature that she should exercise over men's hearts so potent a spell?

The only rival who could have triumphed over her was death. Why had his friend in a manner bequeathed her to him? Was it that he might avenge him? And did he think him capable of inspiring this enchantress with love?

He saw Pierre's face as it had haunted him so often of late in his terrible dreams. It wore a look of indescribable sadness—he fancied he saw the lips move and that he heard them say: "Take care, I have bestowed life upon you, but she will destroy it. Destruction is her mission on earth. Avoid her, beware of her! See to what she has brought me. She lied to you when she told you that it was my wish that you should love her. No, I have fled from her into the bosom of oblivion! Do not believe her, do not listen to her, do not look at her. Withdraw from her path. When you are with her you cannot resist her. This is the decisive moment in which you must choose between life and death."

The sombre countenance of Laurier faded away, and Jacques found himself once more alone, beside the sea, in this enchanted solitude, where nature blossomed radiantly under a cloudless sky. He said to himself:

"I am growing superstitious. What do the frequent fears and the scruples that torment me mean? Can my life depend upon this woman? I have not yet so completely recovered from my illness as I had imagined. But what is the cause of the anxiety I feel? Through what moral crisis am I passing? Because Pierre loved this woman is it then criminal in me to love her? For this is the thought from which my scruples spring. And after all is there not a great deal of individual caprice and of conventionality in what people have agreed to call right and wrong."

"The only object of life is happiness," selfishness answered. "And was not the love of this woman necessary to his happiness? His heart, filled with her image, was deaf to the voice of reason. At this very moment, seated on this sunny rock, the waves dashing their spray up to his feet, silence and solitude around, he felt himself drawn toward the enchantress, and he trembled with impatience. He knew that within half an hour's distance the Battle of Flowers at Nice was drawing all the world of fashion to the Promenade des Anglais. Clemence would be there waiting for him, expecting him. He had but a step to take to join her.

His heart palpitated violently. His whole being reached out toward her. His reason, though vanquished, still protested: "But she has duped you. She has told you she would hold you in her chains, willing or unwilling. Are you then going to obey her as if you were her slave? Truly you have very little pride or courage. Stay where you are, do not go. Avoid her."

But he was already on his feet. The magnetic influence which had always drawn Laurier back to her, no matter how much he might resist it, now exercised its sway over Jacques. The spell of this woman, who, ghoul-like, sapped the power of will of those over whom she wished to cast her spells, triumphed over distance, and prudence and over reason. It was in vain for Jacques longer to resist; she had already conquered. He went back to the house, took his hat and coat, and went away without bidding his sister good-by.

CHAPTER V.

The passion with which Clemence had inspired Jacques was all the more violent for having been so long resisted. And it was shared by her, and with equal ardor. For a time they lived apart from the world, devoted exclusively to each other, wandering among the flowering orange-trees of the garden, or reclining among the silken cushions of the Moorish saloon in the smiling villa on the Mentone road.

In the evening Jacques tore himself away with difficulty from the enchantress and returned to Beaulieu. His mother and sister saw him only for an instant in the morning before he went out. And with profound sadness Mme. de Vignes saw that the unlooked-for restoration of her son to health had been the signal for the resumption of the dissipated life he had formerly led, and which had so nearly brought him to his grave. She had ventured a remonstrance, which had been received with a smile. Jacques, in a hurry to go, had kissed his mother, assuring her that he had never felt stronger in his life, which was true, and that she had no cause for uneasiness. And without staying further to listen to her remonstrances or her entreaties he had taken the train for Monte Carlo.

MADE-IN-CANADA STEERING DEVICE FOR FORD CARS

The Greatest Invention of the Age and Highly Endorsed by Press and Public.

THIS DEVICE has been thoroughly tested in Winnipeg over the roughest roads, and on a street strewn with all kinds of obstacles. The test which was a very severe one was fully successful as the following will show:

Winnipeg "Free Press" April 17th, says:

"The McCracken Steering Device received a severe test Thursday afternoon and to the delight of hundreds of weary armed Ford owners the performance was convincing in the extreme."

Winnipeg "Telegram" April 17th, says:

"The crucial test was over the worst and roughest roads that could be found; bridges and car tracks: the latter at a very acute angle. The car ran true and tracked perfectly. The test proved a great success."

Winnipeg "Tribune" April 17th, says:

"Ford Cars fitted with the McCracken Steering Device were driven over timbers, tracks and obstructions of a nature that would put a non-equipped [illegible]. The device keeps a Ford car on the road, no matter how rough."

THE WISE THRUSH.

A pessimist stood in his garden (a thrush warbled high overhead):
"We can't drive those Huns from those trenches, I don't see much progress," he said.
"If we stick in a groove we shan't [illegible] them to move.
I want to advance with a rush."
"Wait a bit! Wait a bit! Wait a bit! Wait a bit! Wait a bit! Wait a bit!" sang the thrush.

"There's that Kaiser," the pessimist brooded, his forehead all knotted and rough.
"A powerful tyrant to tackle, relentless, and terribly tough.
As I mark his career, I'm beginning to fear
He's a—" pause, and then out of the bush,
"Silly fool! Silly fool! Silly fool! Silly fool! Silly fool! Silly fool!" sang the thrush.

"Nine weary, long months we've been at it," the pessimist said with a groan,
"And think of the millions and millions it's cost us in Flanders alone;
When the end comes—ah me! where, where shall we be?"
From above came a voluble gush—
"In Berlin! In Berlin! In Berlin! In Berlin! In Berlin on a spree!" sang the thrush.

THE LARGEST MAP IN CANADA

The biggest and the best railway map in Canada is that which hangs in the directors' room of the C. P. R. general office—a map 100 feet long by 10 feet high, and which took the combined efforts of three of the cleverest men in the drawing department of the company eighteen months to complete. This map is minute and comprehensive to the last detail. Every inch of railway, every tiniest inlet rearing its head in the lake or river, every city and town and village, it might be said in the whole of the Dominion, is limned in characters which, however minute, are entirely legible.

The double tracking is shown; the course of each system from its commencement to its ending set forth; nothing has escaped the faithful and able chartographers or mapographers, if one may use the word, so that at a glance the high officers of the company may see the course of the system, the river, the lake, the mountain, the stream, in any part of the Dominion.

WAR A CURSE.

(Detroit Free Press.)

We may have doubled, quadrupled, our sales of guns and shrapnel, but if we have lost any material part of the sales of things we use among ourselves the gain by exports is wiped out many times over by the loss of the larger business. The impetus given to a few branches of manufacturing is far offset by the slackening of activity of the rest.

No, the war is not a benefit influence on American business. It has destroyed far more industry than it has created.

BLISTERED FEET.

Here's a Remedy for Those Caused by Shoes Rubbing.

The shoe clerk was rearranging the boxes in their racks along the walls when a man entered the store. He walked with a decided limp, and when he reached the settee he threw himself down on it with a sigh of relief.

The shoe clerk drew up a stool before the customer and removed the right shoe. As he did so the customer almost sprang off the settee in pain.

"Hey, young fellow, go easy on that foot. I can barely stand on it, and if you are not a little more considerate I will be crippled altogether," ejaculated the new customer.

"So your foot is sore," replied the clerk. "Well, what is the matter with it? A corn?"

"No, I haven't got a corn," replied the customer tartly, "but I will tell you what I have got. I have a fine blister on my heel and another one across my big toe, and they were both caused by the shoe that one of the clerks in this store sold me the other day. Now, what are you going to do about it?"

Before making reply the clerk took the measure of the customer's foot and examined the shoe. Then he said.

"These shoes are the correct size. As a matter of fact they are just a trifle too large for you; but any shoe is liable to cause a blister. The blisters are due to the fact that the shoe rubs your foot in some particular spot but that is not always the fault of the shoe. There is a very effective remedy for those blisters.

"Go to the nearest drug store and buy some white adhesive plaster. Any width will do, although sometimes the narrow width is to be preferred because its presence makes less bulk under the stocking than the wide stretch. Put a small strip of plaster across the irritated or blistered part of the foot and leave it there until the irritation or blister disappears. The best is to leave the plaster on until the shoes become soft and have shaped themselves to the feet.

"Thousands of our customers have tried this cure with success. In the summer many persons suffer from blisters on their heels caused by the friction of low shoes. We have recommended this cure and it has worked well in all cases."

A ROBIN IN THE RAIN.

O robin in the evening rain,
Singing thus your heart away
In such merry, mirthful strain,
Know you not 'tis close of day.

Know you not the shadows creep
Softly, oh, so softly near,
That the garden sinks to sleep
'Neath the rain mist's cover drear?

Hearing you, I think you are
Some sky shadow, given song,
Sending mystic music far
The twilight's dusky aisles along.

Why such bubbling, blithesome glee?
Are you singing in your dreams?
Golden visions do you see
Of meadows bright and woodland streams?

Tell me the secret—how you sing
When even is gray on hill and glen,
So shall I learn how I may bring
Sweet comfort to my fellow men.

Oh, Robin in the evening rain,
Perhaps the secret I have guessed;
You're singing o'er this glad refrain
To some one in a sheltered nest.

You think not of the shadowed sky,
Or round where wind wraiths creep and stir;
Love watches in that nest close by
And you are singing just for her!

THE CHURCH'S GREATEST NEED.

(Guelph Mercury.)

The church has plenty of problems just as urgent, or even more so, than church union. It is not new machinery or remodelled machinery that is needed. It is an earnest development and use of the medium and scope in which the church is working right at the present moment, that is most urgent.

THE LAND PROBLEM.

(Ottawa Citizen.)

Men cannot be happy or that country prosperous where a system permits some to appropriate a portion of the value of the product of the labor of others. Society must collect and use for social purposes all the social values for land, which was given by the Creator for the equal use of all, is to be made available for use by all.

TRAINING DISTEMPER . . .

Ever hear of this? Yes, of course you did, but under a different name. You have seen it in cases where the horse was "over trained," worked a little too fast and regular. The nervous system gets the shock, after the voluntary muscular system had been taxed too heavily. The trouble starts in the mucous surface, and the digestive apparatus, too, must then be impaired. He begins to cough when the glands are materially affected.

"SPOHN'S"

is your true salvation. It restores the appetite and normal functions of the whole system. The action in such cases is remarkably rapid and sure for recovery when you use this remedy according to instructions with each bottle. (All wholesale druggists). Sold by all good druggists, horse goods houses, or express prepaid by manufacturers.

Boys as They Eat.

Jerome K. Jerome, in one of his unconsciously sentimental but consciously clever essays remarks:

"It is amusing to see boys eat, when you have not got to pay for it. Their idea of a square meal is a pound and a half of roast beef with five or six good sized potatoes (soapy ones preferred, as being more substantial), plenty of greens, and four thick slices of Yorkshire pudding, followed by a couple of currant dumplings, a few green apples, a pen'orth of nuts, half a dozen jumbles and a bottle of ginger beer. After that they play at horses. How they must despise us men, who require to sit quiet for a couple of hours after dining off a spoonful of clear soup and the wing of a chicken."

HOW WOUNDS HEAL.

Nature's Processes Play a Large Part in the Operation.

Few people have any idea of the wonderful process by which wounds heal. Stitching, dressing, etc., are important operations, but none of them can make good the damage or replace the loss of tissue in a wound. This is the work of our good friends in the blood, the white corpuscles, the "scavengers," so called because they destroy disease germs.

When a wound is made, a bone broken, a nerve torn, etc., it is chiefly by these corpuscles finding their way out of the blood vessels into the surrounding tissues that the injuries by bullet or bayonet are repaired. The union of broken bones, nerves, veins, etc., is effected by the corpuscles finding their way into the coagulated blood which surrounds the injured parts.

They throw out what are called "processes," become fixed and join each other. A new tissue is thus formed which becomes endowed with blood vessels. Fibres follow, and these serve to keep the torn tissues of the wound in that is surgically called "apposition."

In this tissue, in the case of a broken bone, bone salts are deposited, where nerves have been torn by a bullet nerve fibres grow, and so on. These fibres in the course of healing contract, and it is by that power of contraction that the edges of a wound are brought together and united.—Pearson's Weekly.

The Smoker's Paradise.

Mexico may be called the smoker's paradise. There is plenty of good cheap tobacco in that country. Furthermore, no tax is levied upon it. One may buy in Mexico a cigar, every bit as good as the average 10 cent brand in this country, for a sum equivalent to two and a half cents of our money. Cigarettes are cheap in proportion. To protect the domestic article Mexico levies a prohibitive tax upon imported tobacco, so that no Mexican thinks of buying an American cigar. The laboring classes are able to buy two boxes of cigarettes, containing ten each, for two and a half cents in our money. The tobacco is there is the sun dried leaf and of coarse grade, with coarse paper wrappings. The market is abundantly supplied also with cigarettes of high grade tobacco in the best paper wrappings. For the most part the Mexican takes his tobacco in the form of cigarettes. New York Tribune.

THE ONLY MEDICINE FOR LITTLE ONES

Baby's Own Tablets are the only medicine for little ones, being guaranteed by a Government analyst to be absolutely free from injurious drugs. Indelible Ink Tree.

An indelible ink tree, known to botanists as Semecarpus anacardium, is chiefly found in India, but grows also in North Australia and the West Indies. Its nuts supply the natural marking fluid. When dried for commerce the nut is heart shaped and nearly black and contains a black viscid juice. For marking linen or cotton this juice is mixed with quicklime. It can be made into marking ink by treating the nut with a mixture of alcohol and sulphuric ether, and is also used for black varnish.

SOUND DOCTRINE.

(New York Sun.)

An Oklahoma man laid violent hands on his wife because she gave him ham, eggs and toast for breakfast, although he had commanded her to cook pancakes. The judge, a Daniel come to judgment, fined him $25 and costs, taking judicial notice that ham and eggs with toast is a competent and savory breakfast, and memorably ruling that a married man's dominion and authority don't reach into the kitchen; which by necessary inference is not run a la carte. Sound if not kind doctrine. In the matter of food the person bonded in matrimony must take meekly what he can get and disabuse himself of the fantasy that the dining room is a restaurant.

Java's Teak Forests.

Teak forests in Java cover 1,400,000 acres, and as the area reforested is two and a half times as large as the area felled in a given time, this magnificent stock of timber is continually increasing. A pest of the Java teak plantations is alang grass (Imperata arundinacea). In order to prevent the incursions of this plant, as hoeing is too expensive, the foresters sow a leguminous plant, Leucena glauca, between the rows of teak seedlings. This chokes the alang, keeps the soil clean and enriches the soil in humus and nitrogen, and ultimately disappears with the increase of the forest cover.

WANTS MORE MONEY.

When the bill was introduced into the Dominion Parliament at last session increasing the tariff with a view to increase the revenue of the country, the Liberals told the Government that the increased tariff might have the opposite effect on the finances of the country. Time has shown that this contention was right. The revenue has not increased as expected. The high tariff has kept out the goods from which a revenue was expected, and the manufacturers, no doubt in many cases, have thus been able to add the extra tariff rate to the cost of their goods, thus pocketing what should have gone into the public treasury.

Minister of Finance White, seeing that he is not getting the revenue he need, is looking around for means to secure more money by taxation of some kind or another. The money needed for the war he will continue to borrow from Britain, to be paid back at a more convenient season, but he does not want to borrow for ordinary expenditure, hence the people may expect further taxation to be imposed on form. Talk of holding an October session of the House to introduce such legislation is now rife, with the probability that a fall election may yet be held. The threat is held out that unless the Opposition muzzles itself and takes just what the Government is willing to give it, there will be an election before the year is out. The Government is said to be waiting to hear what Sir George Perley advises.

THE JEW AND THE WAR.

What has this war in store for the Jewish race? is a question that people are asking. Thousands of Jews are fighting in the armies of the belligerents, some of them against their own will. They are making many sacrifices in the interests of their masters or of the king to whom they willingly owe allegiance. In Poland and Galicia the non-combatant Jew is suffering dire calamities and his property is being destroyed. What is he going to get out of all this? When peace is declared and the terms arranged is he to be left out of all consideration, and will he still be left to the mercy of his Russian taskmasters and his perhaps no less cruel situation in Poland? This war, we are told, is being waged on behalf of the small nationalities. His Holiness the Pope, we understand, is anxious to be represented when the peace terms are being considered. He, it is said, wants the "regulations" between the Vatican and the Government of Italy internationalized. That is to say, he wants the agreement between the two to receive the sanction and signature of the great powers, so that Italy could not withdraw the regulation at will. The Pope is also anxious to see that the Church does not suffer by the peace terms.

There is a movement also to have the Jewish people represented in some way when peace is being discussed. They wish some guarantee that their liberties will be protected in Russia and Poland. They have an idea that they are entitled to the same liberties as obtain among the people among whom they live, and they argue that if the powers are to guarantee the life and liberty of the small nations, the Jewish nation, scattered though it may be, shall have the same guarantees vouchsafed it. They dread the going back to the old horrible conditions after the war is over. No one can blame them, and if out of this awful world tragedy the Jew can come to his own and pogroms and massacres be things of the past, the war will not have been waged entirely in vain.

Fred T. Jane, a British naval expert, speaking at Newcastle the other day, said that some people asked why Admiral Jellicoe had been placed in command of the fleet. The answer was easily given, he said. For some time Admiral Jellicoe had been known as the Admiral who always won in manoeuvres, even when it had been arranged that he should lose. It was impossible to pass over such a man when war time came.

Mrs. Pankhurst should be made assistant to the new Minister of Munitions. In London the other day she said in a public address: "In Germany to-day there are over half a million women making shells. In England we want not merely to devote ourselves to the making of munitions, but also see that every woman, in an organized way, not in the present haphazard fashion, is devoting herself solely to war purposes." The women are willing. Give them the chance to make good.

The Winnipeg Free Press prints a seditious letter from a Northwest German. In reply, it says that this man is only a sample of others in the West, and they are merely the result of the free circulation of German newspapers from the United States. And it adds: "As for the writer of this letter, he is a traitor if he is a British citizen; otherwise he is an alien enemy. His case is respectfully referred to the proper authorities." The Dominion Government seems quite indifferent to the circulation of these papers in the country.

The conduct of the Conservative press and party in the old country has been held up to the Liberals of Canada as worthy of emulation. The Saturday Westminster Gazette, in an article, written before the formation of the Coalition Government, shows that their conduct was not exactly what it was cracked up to be by the Canadian Tories. It said:

> A section of the Unionist Press has for some time been intent on breaking the party truce by its constant attacks on the Government. Its object seems to be to sow dissension and distrust with the hope of driving the Government out of office or of forcing it to a coalition, and it concentrates its attacks first on one Minister and then on another. Its leading articles afford excellent material for the German Press, which points with huge delight to the divided and distracted counsels of the enemy, and draws the consoling moral that a country which is thus unable to compose its differences at the present time is hardly likely to prove victorious in a long and desperate war, that requires the undivided support of the nation.

Suffered From Salt Rheum
FOR MANY YEARS.

Salt Rheum or Eczema is one of the most painful of all skin diseases, and if not attended to immediately may become very deep seated.

Give the blood a good cleansing by the use of that grand old medicine Burdock Blood Bitters. This sterling remedy has been on the market for the past forty years, and is the best blood cleanser on the market to-day.

Mrs. William H. Fowlie, Cole's Island, N.B., writes: "I have been a sufferer from salt rheum for a good many years, and was so bad I could not do any own work. I tried a good many medicines, but they all failed to do me any good until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. I had not taken one bottle until I found a great change, and I am most thankful for trying it. I hope that every other sufferer from salt rheum will try B.B.B."

Burdock Blood Bitters is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

THE Changeling

"Certainly," said Madam Conway. "You remain here, Maggie; I will bring down your shawl," and she glided from the room, leaving them purposely alone.

Mag was a good deal astonished, slightly embarrassed and a little provoked, all of which Arthur Carrollton readily saw; but this did not prevent his talking to her, and during the few moments of Madam Conway's absence he decided that neither Margaret's beauty, nor yet her originality, had been overrated by her partial grandmother, while Mag, on her part, mentally pronounced him "the finest-looking, the most refined, the most gentlemanly, the proudest, and the hatefulest man she had ever seen!"

Wholly unconscious of her cogitation, he wrapped her shawl very carefully about her, taking care to cover her white shoulders from the night air; then, offering his arm to her grandmother, he led the way to the carriage, whither she followed him, wondering if Henry would be jealous, and thinking her first act would be to tell him "how she hated Arthur Carrollton, and always should!"

* * * * * * *

It was a gay, brilliant scene which Mrs. Morton's drawing-rooms presented, and as yet the centre of attraction, Theo, near the door, was bowing to the many strangers who sought her acquaintance. Greatly she marvelled at the long delay of her grandmother and Maggie, and she had just suggested to Henry that he should go in quest of them, when she saw her sister ascending the stairs.

On a sofa across the room sat a pale young girl, arrayed in white, her silken curls falling around her neck like a golden shower, and her mournful eyes ofttime scanning eagerly each new-comer, then with a look of disappointment drooping beneath the long lashes which rested wearily upon her colorless cheek. It was Rose Warner, and the face she sought was Maggie Miller's. She had seen no resemblance of it yet, for Henry had no daguerreotype. Still, she felt sure she would know her, and when at last, in her queenly beauty, Maggie came, leaning on Arthur Carrollton's arm, Rose's heart made ready answer to the oft-repeated question, "Who is she?"

"Beautiful, gloriously beautiful," she whispered, softly, while from the grave of her buried hopes there came one wild heart-throb, one sudden burst of pain, caused by the first sight of her rival, and then Rose Warner grew calm again, and those who saw the pressure of her hand upon her side dreamed not of the fierce pang within. She had asked her brother not to tell Maggie she was to be there. She would rather watch her awhile, herself unknown; and now, with eager, curious eyes, she followed Maggie, who was quickly surrounded by a host of admirers.

It was Maggie's first introduction into society, and yet so perfect was her intuition of what was proper that neither by word or deed did she do aught to shock the most fastidious. It is true her merry laugh more than once rang out above the din of voices, but it was so joyous that no one objected, particularly when they looked on her bright and almost childish face. Arthur Carrollton, too, acting as her escort, aided her materially, for it was soon whispered around that he was a wealthy Englishman, and many were the comments made upon the handsome couple, who seemed singularly adapted to each other. A glance had convinced Arthur Carrollton that Maggie was by far the most beautiful lady present, and feeling that on this her first introduction into society she needed some one to guide her, as it were, from the many foolish, flattering speeches which were sure to be made in her hearing, he kept her at his side, where she was nothing loth to stay, for, notwithstanding that she "hated him so," there was about him a fascination she did not try to resist.

"They are a splendid couple," thought Rose, and then she looked to see how Henry was affected by the attentions of the handsome stranger.

But Henry was not jealous, and standing a little aloof, he felt more pleasure than pain in watching Maggie as she received the homage of the gay throng. Thoughts similar to those of Rose, however, forced themselves upon him as he saw the dignified bearing of Mr. Carrollton, and for the first time in his life he was conscious of an uncontrollable feeling of inferiority to something or somebody—he hardly knew what. This feeling, however, passed away when Maggie came at last to his side, with her winning smile, and playful words.

Very closely Madam Conway watched her now; but Maggie did not heed it, and, leaning on Henry's arm, she seemed oblivious to all save him. After a time he led her out upon a side piazza, where they would be comparatively alone. Observing that she seemed a little chilly, he left her for a moment while he went in quest of her shawl. Scarcely was he gone when a slight, fairy form came flitting through the moonlight to where Maggie sat, and twining its snow-white arms around her neck, looked lovingly into her eyes, whispering soft and low, "My sister!"

"My sister!" How Maggie's blood bounded at the sound of that name, which even the night wind, sighing through the trees, seemed to take up and repeat, "My sister!" What was there in those words thus to affect her? Was that fair young creature, who hung so fondly over her, naught to her save a common stranger? Was there no tie between them, no bond of sympathy and love? We ask this of you, the reader, and not of Maggie Miller, for to her there came no questionings like this. She only knew that every pulsation of her heart responded to the name of sister, when breathed by sweet Rose Warner, and folding her arms about her, she pillowed the golden head upon her bosom and, parting back the clustering curls, gazed long and earnestly into a face which seemed so heavenly and pure.

Few were the words then uttered at first, for the mysterious, invisible something which prompted each to look into the other's eyes, to clasp the other's hands, to kiss the other's lips, and whisper the other's name.

"I have wished so much to see you to know if you are worthy of my noble brother," said Rose, at last, thinking she must say something on the subject uppermost in both their minds.

"And am I worthy?" asked Maggie, the bright blushes stealing over her cheek. "Will you let me be your sister?"

"My heart would claim you for that, even though I had no brother," answered Rose, and again her lips touched those of Maggie.

Seeing them thus together, Harry tarried purposely a long time, and when at last he rejoined them he proposed returning to the drawing-room, where many inquiries were being made for Maggie.

"I have looked for you a long time, Miss Maggie," said Mr. Carrollton. "I wish to hear you play," and, taking her arm in his, he led her to the piano.

From the moment of her first introduction to him, Maggie had felt that there was something commanding in his manner something she could not disobey; and now, though she fancied it was impossible to play before that multitude, she seated herself mechanically, and while the keys swam before her eyes, went through a difficult piece which she had never but once before executed correctly.

"You have done well—much better than I anticipated," said Mr. Carrollton, again offering her his arm, and though a little vexed, those few words of commendation were worth more to Maggie than the most flattering speech which Henry Warner had ever made to her.

Soon after leaving the piano a young man approached and invited her to waltz. This was something in which Maggie excelled; for two winters before, Madam Conway had hired a teacher to instruct her granddaughters in dancing, and she was about to accept the invitation when, drawing her arm still closer with his own, Mr. Carrollton looked down upon her, saying softly, "I wouldn't."

Maggie had often waltzed with Henry at home. He saw no harm in it, and now when Arthur Carrollton objected she was provoked, while at the same time she felt constrained to decline.

"Some time, when I know you better, I will explain to you why I do not think it proper for young girls to waltz with every one," said Mr. Carrollton; and leading her from the drawing-room, he devoted himself to her for the remainder of the evening, making himself so perfectly agreeable that Maggie forgot everything, even Henry Warner, who in the meantime had tried to recognize in Madam Conway an acquaintance.

A cool nod, however, was all the token of recognition she had to give him. This state of feeling augured ill for the success of his suit; but when at a late hour that night, in spite of grandmother or Englishman, he handed Maggie to the carriage he whispered to her softly, "I will see her to-morrow morning and know the worst."

The words caught the quick ear of Madam Conway, but not wishing Mr. Carrollton to know there was anything particular between her granddaughter and Henry Warner, she said nothing, and when arrived at last at the hotel she asked an explanation, Maggie, who hurried off to bed, was too sleepy to give an answer.

"I shall know before long, any way, if he sees me in the morning," she thought, as she heard a distant clock strike two, and settled her face into the withering frown which which she intended to annihilate Henry Warner. The old lady was herself ere long much faster asleep than the young girl at her side, who was thinking of Henry Warner, wishing he was three inches taller or herself three inches shorter, and wondering if his square shoulders would not be somewhat improved by braces.

"I never noticed how short and [illegible] he was," she thought, "until I saw him standing by the side of Mr. Carrollton, who is such a splendid figure, so tall and straight; but pshaw, overgrown girls like me always get short husbands, they say," and satisfied with this conclusion she fell asleep.

CHAPTER XIV.

At a comparatively early hour Madam Conway arose, and, going to the parlor, found there Arthur Carrollton, who asked if Margaret were not yet up. "Say that I wish her to ride with me on horseback," said he. "The morning air will do her good," and quite delighted, Madam Conway carried the message to her granddaughter.

"Tell him I can't do it," answered the sleepy Maggie, adjusting herself for another nap. Then, as she thought how his eyes probably looked as he said, "I wish her to ride," she felt inclined to obey, and greatly to her grandmother's surprise, she commenced dressing.

Maggie's riding dress was borrowed, and though it did not fit her exactly, she looked unusually well when she met Mr. Carrollton in the lower hall, and once mounted upon the gay steed, and galloping away into the country, she felt more than repaid for the loss of her morning slumber.

"You ride well," said Mr. Carrollton, when at last they paused upon the brow of a hill, overlooking the town, "but you have some faults, which, with your permission, I will correct," and in the most polite and gentlemanly manner, he proceeded to speak of a few points wherein her riding might be improved.

Among other things, he said she rode too fast for a lady, and, biting her lip, Maggie thought, "If I only had Gritty here I'd lead him such a race as would either break his bones or his neck, I'm not particular which!"

Still, she followed his directions implicitly, and when, ere they reached home, he told her that she excelled many whom he had known for years in the [illegible], she felt repaid for his [illegible], which she knew were just, [illegible] immediately after breakfast, he announced his intention of going directly to Boston, telling Maggie he should probably return that evening and go with her to Hillsdale on the morrow.

Scarcely had he gone when Henry Warner appeared asking an interview with Madam Conway, who haughtily led the way into a private room. Very candidly and honorably Henry made known to her his wishes, whereupon a most stormy scene ensued, the lady so far forgetting herself as to raise her voice several notes above its usual pitch; while Henry, angered by her insulting words, bade her take the consequences of her refusal, hinting that girls had been known to marry without their guardian's consent.

"An elopement, hey? He threatens me with an elopement, does he?" said Madam Conway, as the door closed after him. "I am glad he warned me in time," and then, trembling in every limb lest Maggie should be spirited away before her very eyes, she determined upon going home immediately, and leaving Arthur Carrollton to follow in the cars.

Accordingly Maggie was bidden to pack her things at once, the excited old lady keeping her eye constantly upon her to see that she did not disappear through the window or some other improbable place. In silence Maggie obeyed, pouting the while a very little, partly because she should not again see Henry, partly because she had confidently expected to ride home with Mr. Carrollton, and partly because she wished to stay to the fireman's muster, which had been long talked about, and was to take place on the morrow. They were ready at last, and then in a very perturbed state of feeling, Madam Conway waited for her carriage, which was not forthcoming, and upon inquiry, George Douglas learned that, having counted upon another day in the city, Mike was now going through a series of plunge baths by way of sobering himself ere appearing before his mistress. This, however, George kept from Madam Conway, not wishing to alarm her; and when, after a time, Mike appeared sitting bolt upright upon the box, with the lines grasped firmly in his hands, she did not suspect the truth, nor knew that he, too, was angry for being thus compelled to go home before he saw the firemen.

Thinking him sober enough to be perfectly safe, George Douglas felt no fear, and bowing to his new relatives, then went back to comfort Theo, who, as a matter of course, cried a little when the carriage drove away. Worcester was left behind, and they were far out in the country ere a word was exchanged between Madam Conway and Maggie; for while the latter was pouting behind her veil, the former was wondering what possessed Mike to drive into every rut and over every stone.

"You, Mike!" she exclaimed at last, leaning from the window. "What ails you?"

"Nothing, as I'm a living man," answered Mike, halting so suddenly as to jerk the lady backward and crush the crown of her bonnet.

Straightening herself up, and trying in vain to smooth the jam, Madam Conway continued. "In liquor, I know. I wish I had stayed at home." But Mike loudly denied the charge, declaring "he had spent the blessed night at a meeting of the Sons, where they passed round nothing stronger than lemons and water, and if the horses chose to run off the track, 'twasn't his fault—he couldn't help it," and with the air of one deeply injured, he again started forward, turning off ere long into a cross road, which, as they advanced, grew more stony and rough, while the farm-houses, as a general thing, presented a far less respectable appearance than those on the Hillsdale road.

"Mike, you villain!" ejaculated the lady, as they ran down into a ditch, and she sprang to one side to keep the carriage from going over.

But ere she had time for anything further, one of the axletrees snapped asunder, and to proceed further in their present condition was impossible. Alighting from the carriage, and setting her little feet upon the ground with a vengeance, Madam Conway upbraided Mike unmercifully for his carelessness, and next chided Maggie for manifesting no more concern.

"You'd as lief go to destruction as not, I do believe!" said she, looking ruefully after the bandbox containing her purple satin.

"I'd rather go there first," answered Maggie, pointing to a brown, old-fashioned farmhouse about a quarter of a mile away.

At first Madam Conway objected, saying she preferred sitting on the bank to intruding herself upon strangers; but as it was now noon-day, and the warm September sun poured fiercely down upon her, she finally concluded to follow Maggie's advice, and gathering up her box and parasol, started for the house, which, with its tansy patch on the right, and its single poplar tree in front, presented rather an uninviting appearance.

"Some vulgar creatures live there, I know. Just hear that old tin horn," she exclaimed, as a blast, loud and shrill, blown by practised lips, told to the men in a distant field that dinner was ready.

A nearer approach disclosed to view a slanting-roofed farmhouse, such as is often found in New England, with wide, narrow windows, small panes of glass, and the most indispensable paper curtains of blue, closely shading the windows of what was probably "the best room." In the apartment opposite, however, they were rolled up so as to show the old-fashioned drapery of dimity, bordered with a netted fringe. Half a dozen broken pitchers and pots held geraniums, verbenas and other plants, while the well-kept beds of hollyhocks, sunflowers and poppies indicated a taste for flowers in some one. Everything about the house was faultlessly neat. The door-sill was scrubbed to a chalky white, while the uncovered floor wore the same polished hue.

All this Madam Conway saw at a glance, but it did not prevent her from holding high her aristocratic skirts, lest they should be contaminated, and when, in answer to her knock, an odd-looking, peculiarly dressed woman appeared, she uttered an exclamation of disgust, and, turning to Maggie said: "You talk—I can't!"

But the woman did not stand at all upon ceremony. For the last ten minutes she had been watching the strangers as they toiled over the sandy road, and when sure they were coming there, had retreated into her bedroom, donning a flaming red calico, which, guiltless of hoops, clung to her tenaciously, showing her form to good advantage, and rousing at once the risibles of Maggie. A black lace cap, ornamented with ribbons of the same fanciful color as the dress, adorned her head; and with a dozen or more pins in her mouth, she now appeared working her sleeve and smoothing down the black collar upon her neck.

In a few words Maggie explained to her their misfortune and asked permission to tarry there until the carriage was repaired.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON XII., JUNE 20, 1915.

A Prayer for the Tempted—Temperance Lesson.—Psalm 141. 1-10.

Commentary.—I. A longing to have prayer heard (vs. 1, 2). 1. Lord—Jehovah. The psalmist was surely in need of help and he made his appeal to the ever-living, almighty God. It is supposed by some that he was fleeing from Saul into the land of the Philistines, where he had been in flight once before. "His second visit to Gath was a final and hazardous resort, exposed, as the history shows, to the jealousy of the Philistine nobility on the one hand and the robber tribes of the desert on the other. He had to pass only a few miles eastward to come within Saul's dominions, and meet a stronger and a deadlier foe, to escape whom he had accepted this desperate alternative."—Whedon. I cry unto thee—He makes his plea personally. He was the one in distress, and for himself he asks help. Make haste unto me—There is directness in the expressions, "unto thee," and "unto me." A heart that sends forth such a cry in sincerity is sure to receive a fitting response. The plea for haste shows the urgency of the case. Give ear unto my voice—The petitioner was a believer in prayer. He was asking with the expectation of receiving. When I cry unto thee—Twice in this verse he makes use of the words, "I cry unto thee." "Our prayer and God's mercy are like two buckets in a well; while the one ascends, the other descends."—Hopkins.

2. Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense—The psalmist carefully and thoughtfully makes his petition. The figure is that of preparing the incense which was to be burned in the tabernacle. David desired to "set forth" his prayer before the Lord, that it might be accepted, and have an answer. Lifting up of my hands—Lifting up the hands is a token of earnest desire. It also indicates acquiescence in the will of God. "Prayer is sometimes presented without words by the very motions of our bodies. Bended knees and lifted hands are the tokens of earnest, expectant prayer."—Spurgeon. As the evening sacrifice—The evening sacrifice was spoken of as a meal-offering. It was a constant memorial of God's presence with His people and His acceptance of their sacrifices. "The psalmist appears to have been at this time at a distance from the sanctuary; and therefore could not perform the divine worship in the way prescribed by the law. What could he do? Why, as he could not worship according to the letter of the law, he would worship God according to the spirit. Then prayer is accepted in the place of incense, and the lifting up of his hands in gratitude and self-dedication to God is accepted in the place of the evening sacrifice."—Clarke.

II. Petitions for Deliverance from Temptation (vs. 3-10). 3. Set a watch ... before my mouth—The psalmist was impressed with the danger of saying unwise or evil things, and realized that it required watchfulness to make a right use of the power of speech. The figure here used is a strong one. As a soldier is placed at a door or gate to keep in any who had no right to go out so the petitioner would have the Lord act as guard over his lips that no wrong word should proceed from them. Falsehood, exaggeration, evil-speaking, foolish talking, cruel words, unkind and uncharitable remarks, should not be allowed to escape the lips. "Nature having made my lips to be a door, that no word may be suffered to go out which may any way tend to the dishonor of God, or the hurt of others."—Henry. 4. Incline not my heart to any evil thing—The prayer is now for the right disposition of heart. The psalmist had just prayed that the words might be guarded, and now he asks that his heart might not be inclined to any wrong course. If the heart was rightly disposed, the words would tend to be right also, to practise wicked works—He was surrounded by evil men and he prayed to be kept from falling into their ways. With men that work iniquity—The influence of one man over another is here recognized. Evil associations have resulted in the ruin of untold numbers of men and women, young and old, and especially the young. One cannot from choice associate with workers of iniquity without being corrupted. A great reason that myriads are being drawn into the awful current of alcoholism is that people are led by evil companions to take strong drink, being assured by them that there is no harm at all in it. The psalmist saw the danger of being drawn into sin, hence he offered this prayer. Let me not eat of their dainties—Neither at their idol feasts nor as a guest at their social entertainments; thus tacitly condemning their practices.—Whedon.

5. Let the righteous smite me—The psalmist prefers to be beaten or hammered, as the Hebrew signifies, by the righteous, rather than to feast with the wicked. The thought appears to be that reproof from the righteous, which is often painful, is far better than the flattery of the workers of iniquity. An excellent oil—Oil was considered as healing and refreshing. Shall not break my head—It will be so far from breaking the head that it will strengthen and gladden the soul. The rebuke that is administered in love is of inestimable value to the one reproved. In their calamities—That is, if ever they who are my reprovers fall into calamity, though they may think they provoked me so by reproving me, that they have lost my love, and have cast themselves out of my prayers, yet I will pray for them with all my heart, as their matter shall require.—Caryl. 6. When their judges are overthrown—This may have reference to the incident at Hachilah, when David approached Saul in the camp here and took his spear and cruse of water; then, having gone some distance away, talked kindly to him. David spared Saul's life there, and thenceforth Saul did not seek to kill David.

7. Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth—The figure is that of a burial place which has been dug up or otherwise disturbed, and the bones are scattered all about. This was a representation of the condition of the Israelitish nation under the faulty rule of Saul in his later years. His conduct produced discord within the nation, and his weakness permitted outside enemies to prey upon it. This is a striking picture of the ruin caused by the liquor traffic. 8. Mine eyes are unto thee—The outward conditions might be unfavorable and deplorable, yet there was help in God; therefore the psalmist fixed his eyes upon him in earnest supplication. In thee is my trust—His faith in God was steady and strong. Leave not my soul destitute—There is no other destitution that can compare with soul destitution.

9. Keep them from the snares—This prayer is appropriate for all to pray. Satan has snares and pitfalls laid for all, and we are in danger of being taken in them. Snares and gins are hidden and the unsuspecting victims fall into them unawares. The saloon, the wine-room and the party where wine is served are snares, but they are more or less open and exposed to view, and may be shunned; but the personal friend who offers wine to another in the home is consciously or unconsciously working for the downfall of the tempted person. 10. Let the wicked fall into their own nets—The wicked shall fall into their own nets. It has been the case again and again, that those who have laid their plans to bring others into trouble have fallen into trouble themselves. No one can lead others astray without suffering for it.

Questions.—Who wrote this psalm? Under what circumstances was it written? What shows the earnestness of the prayer? What does the lifting up of the hands to God signify? What is said about carefulness in speech? What is the value of reproof? What petition in the psalm are suited to those who are tempted? What portions of the lesson have a bearing upon temperance? What is liable to come to those who try to cause others to fall?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Comprehensive prayer.

I. Contemplates human insufficiency.

II. Invokes the divine guardianship.

I. Contemplates human insufficiency. In this psalm we have David's prayer expressing his dependence, his desire, his trust. With him prayer was more than a petition. It was the going up of the whole soul toward God, confessing need and utter dependence upon divine grace. He pleaded that prayer might be with him a settled institution. The psalm seems to be his cry under great temptation, not so much from persecution as from seducing favors. The more hopeless the state of things seemed, the more steadfastly was his gaze fixed on God. The more emphatic his confession, the more confidently ascended his prayer. The psalmist felt he could not trust himself to examine, criticise or qualify his own speech, especially in times of excitement. He expressed a deep sense of the connection between circumstances and feeling, and a deep sense of the control God can have of the feelings through the mastery of circumstances. To him prayer was a better defense against persecutions than retaliation. It was also David's safeguard against the snares of sin. Prayer was therefore of the essential nature of a true sacrifice, an appeal to God going from man's spirit to the divine Spirit, symbolized by the incense or slain lamb. It implies for the time, at least, being freed from earthly entanglements. It is leaving the baser self, the carrying of the sublimer self into the presence of God. Surroundings may not immediately change, but the soul does. The prayer of faith is the victory that overcomes the world within and without, for it forces its way into God's light and brings the interceding divine strength. David was as earnest for God's grace within, as for his favor toward him in the events of life. Beginning and ending the day with God was his security against his human frailty.

II. Invokes the divine guardianship. This psalm is an invocation for divine attention to human needs; for complete readiness to receive righteous reproof, for the maintenance of a devout and believing soul in the midst of enemies and for ultimate deliverance from them all. In asking God to set a sentinel at the door of his lips, the psalmist does but in a figure ask God to give him quietness and self-control so that he may be able to judge the wisdom of what he was moved to speak. He would then become his own sentinel in the possession of that most valuable power of self-criticism. The invaluable blessing of strength of will is only won by diligent self-restraint and watchful self-recollection, but it may be sapped and wasted by unguarded and multitudinous speech. David sought God's special grace alone as his conqueror over the common sin of unguarded speech. Prayer may be well directed in gaining power over the tongue. The tongue is never harder to be tamed than when the individual is suffering at the hands of others. In the regulation of the tongue there is much contemplated. There are the laws of prudence, of purity, of veracity, of kindness, of utility, of piety. The psalmist included all when he prayed that he might not commit himself by rash or unguarded speech. He prayed again that he might have faithful reprovers. In them he recognized the correction of man to be in truth the guidance of God. He believed the [illegible] reception of rebuke might save him from much greater sorrow that otherwise might come upon him. He believed it would result in an improvement of conduct and enlargement of usefulness for which he would have reason to praise God. He recognized a righteous reprover as one who felt deeply the peril of sin, who loved the soul of his fellow man and to whom the honor of God was most desired. For such the psalmist prayed and such he loved. By his upward look to God the psalmist kept renewed and sought divine favor for others. David identified himself with past generations of God's people. He was filled with compassion for the human family. He saw men in their littleness as creatures of a few fleeting years. He saw them in their greatness as men trusting in the living God amid all the changing scenes of life. He saw the wicked as those distinct from the people of God in their studied efforts to overthrow the work of divine grace in the souls of men. David's power in prayer, his habit of trust and the grace of God brought him repose. By inward triumph he was able to honor God in his outward career and was helpful to his nation.—T. R. A.

Trees That Explode.

All lightning blasted trees explode, as overcharged boilers do. The flame of the lightning does not burn them nor does the electric flash split them like an axe. They simply explode, overcharged, as may be a boiler with steam. The lightning is conducted into the damp interstices of the trunk and into the hollows under the bark. Its tremendous heat at once turns all the moisture in those cramped spaces into steam. This steam in its immediate explosion blows the tree asunder.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE's editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE's circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the woman's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the 'big' war has only begun.

THE SECOND WARNING

The second American note to Berlin, though not lacking in firmness is somewhat milder in language than the first. Hence their is some surprise over the fact that Bryan who signed the first, balk at the other. Probably he was considering more than the terms of the note. He looked forward to a situation in which a break would be inevitable and he felt that he would rather be outside the Cabinet and free than inside and continually protesting and arguing over the course to be pursued.

Meanwhile it is important to note not only that the President is fully supported in the course he has taken but that he could have obtained support for a note couched in stronger language. The New York Tribune describes the note as "weak and inconclusive." The criticism may be regarded as too severe, but it is an indication of American public feeling which Germany would not disregard if its diplomacy were guided by reason.

FARM LABOR IN WESTERN PROVINCES

The Manitoba Free Press points out that the farmers of Western Canada have a very hard problem awaiting them. There is the promise of an abundant harvest; the acreage is much larger than ever before. Two months hence says the Free Press, if the present expectations are even partially fulfilled, there will be the greatest shortage of labor in Western Canada that has ever been known. Two years ago, when the west had its last big crop it was necessary to import 25,000 men from the East. This year there is the prospect of even more work to be done and fewer men to do it. Will it be possible to get the necessary help from the East? But Ontario farmers, are themselves complaining of scarcity of help and a good deal of what there was of superfluous population available for farm work has been taken up by the war. Under the circumstances the Free Press urges the farmers of the West to begin at once to make provision for harvest help. It thinks the problem could be solved without much difficulty if the farmers would make their engagements now and make them for long enough to cover both the harvest and the threshing.

HOLLAND AND THE WAR

Holland is daily feeling more deeply the injuries of war. It is almost impossible for the people of that country to reason away the suspicion that Germany has designs upon Holland and aims to force her to join the allies, and to do it at a moment that will best suit German plans.

The agents of Germany are every where in Holland many of them newspaper writers for the German press, writing special articles, and copies of the paper are sent free of charge to all the clubs, libraries and hotels. The text of much of this voluminous writing is the might of Germany, her need for a sea front, the inability of a small nation to keep its feet at a time of European reconstruction. Holland, too, has suffered in her trade, has been at vast expense in keeping her armies in readiness for defence, in looking after Belgian refugees and interned belligerents of different countries. Quite a few of her trading ships have been destroyed by torpedoes or mines. Her fishing smacks have been arrogantly seized, escorted to Hamburg, and forced to sell their fish there instead of in their home

Worst of all, perhaps, in its effects on trade is the recent act of the Germans in closing the Belgian frontier entirely against Holland. No doubt this has been done to conceal the military operations under way there. Until recently it was possible for a Dutch business man to secure special passports that enabled him to visit Brussels or Antwerp. He can do so no longer, and even the food given by Holland towards Belgian relief has to be pushed over the frontier line and left there to be entrusted to the German soldiers for delivery to those for whom it is intended.

In every way the position of Holland is a most trying one. Behind it all is the knowledge that if Germany can hold what she has got she will reach and seize a good deal more.

The Latest From the Front.

Since the opening of the Great European War last August the cable service of The Globe, Toronto has attracted attention from one end of Canada to the other owing to its completeness and reliability. Every day the cable news is condensed and interpreted on the front page under the title of "The War Summary." This feature makes plain and intelligible what would otherwise be confusing to the reader. The Globe maintains its position as "Canada's National Newspaper," as is proven by the fact that its circulation of 82,000 is much larger than that of any other morning paper in the Dominion. Elsewhere in this issue appears an advertisement of The Globe, offering the paper sent to any address in Canada for $3.00 per year. A special clubbing offer of The Globe, Daily, and The Telescope one year for $3.00 is now made, thus ensuring the best metropolitan daily and the best local paper at a cut rate.

Valuation Term Extended.

During the session of the County Council just ended. There was a long and very warm discussion as to the equalization of the County. The term for the use of the reports and valuations made by the County valuators expiring but under the Statute the Council has the power to extend the time for five years. Some of the members, especially Messrs. Whitcher, Albemarle, Hunter, Kincardine Township and Phelan, Greenock, thought the present valuations unfair to their municipalities. Some wished to do away with the valuators altogether and revert to the old system of equalizing from the assessment rolls, while others wanted a new valuation made, and others wanted to extend terms, the expense of a new valuation being considerable and it being doubtful if it would result any better and many members thought that to go back to the old system of taking the assessment rolls would make matters much worse. It was finally determined to extend the term of the present valuation.

Barbed Wire for Port Elgin.

"Port Elgin, Ont., is a town with about 1200 population, most of'em hyphenated Germans, and we are assured by one of the few loyal citizens of the burg, that we are correct in our surmise that kind of German is a darned sight worse than home born breed. The Lusitania catastrophe was the cause of much rejoicing among the squareheads who were not handicapped by the necessity of making glad quietly or in secret. In church and factory the atmosphere is impregnated with pro-Germanism, and little trouble is taken to hide their renewed expressions of loyalty to the Kaiser. It would be easier, instead of removing the disloyal for Port Elgin and interning them in some other part, to put a guard on the whole town and constitute it an internment camp, with permission to remove the truly loyal to more congenial climes." The above article which was published in Jack Canuck has, as might be judged, raised a storm of protest in the Lake-shore town, and the town council have taken steps against the paper for printing these maliciously false and unjust statements.

A number of country weekly papers in Ontario have changed their day of publication from Thursday to Friday. This, it is claimed gives better satisfaction to everyone concerned and particularly the advertisers.

A town that is large enough and good enough for a man to earn his living is good enough for him to buy his provisions in. If he does not think so, both he and the town would be better off if his tent were pitched in other pastures.

There was a brisk horse market in Paisley on Tuesday, when the [illegible] Army purchasing officers were here again. Forty-seven animals were purchased chiefly from the local buyers who had bought from the farmers and fitted up a lot from which few were refused. Advocate.

Death of Mr. Hector Herd.

After an illness extending over a year death finally came to Mr. Hector Herd of Greenock on Sunday evening. Mr. Herd was in his fifty [illegible] year and was well known throughout Greenock and equally well liked by his many friends. He is survived by his widow and seven of a family. They are: Mrs John Halliday of Teeswater Mrs. Bell of Hanover, Mrs. Walter Halliday at home, George, who is living on the Durham road just east of the homestead, and Florence, Violet and Olive at home. The funeral was held on Tuesday, interment being in the Baptist Cemetery on the Durham Road.—Teeswater News.

You Must Work

Whether you handle a pick or pen a wheelbarrow or a set of books dig ditches or edit a paper, ring an auction bell or write funny things, you must work. Don't be afraid of killing yourself with work. Work gives an appetite for meals, gives the appreciation of a holiday. There are young men who do not work but the world is not proud of them. It does not even know their names it simply speaks of them as of old so and so's boy. The great busy world does not even know what they are. So find out what you want to do and do it; take off your coat and make a dust in the world. The busier you are the less deviltry you will get into, the sweeter will be your sleep and better satisfied will the world be with you.

The Value of Birds

The insects that destroy our fruit crops attack every portion of the tree and its fruit. The woolly aphis attacks the roots; the trunk and limbs are preyed upon by millions of plant-lice, scale insects and borers; the leaves are devastated by the all-devouring leaf-worms, canker-worms and tent-caterpillars, while the fruit itself is attacked by the curculio, codling-moth and apple maggot. By the annual expenditure of about $8,000,000 in cash in the spraying of apple-trees, the destructiveness of the codling moth and curculio have been greatly reduced; but of course that great sum must be set down as a total loss to the farmers and consumers, in addition to a shrinkage of $12,000,000 in the annual crop from insect ravages that could not be prevented. Now, in view of the foregoing, is it or is it not, worth while for serious-minded men to do their very utmost, continuously, to protect from foolish and brutal slaughter man's only allies in the war, the insect eating birds?

Getting Together

A Retail Merchants' Association is a very useful organization. It is not an organization for a combine of prices. Usually these combinations fail in a short time, but an association formed for the purpose of promoting the town generally as a trading centre, and linking up the district merchants in an effort to give service and values to the buying public in order that their stores may become the trading places rather than the big city departmental stores. Then, too, a real live association of merchants requires men as officers who are unselfish. Men who realize that even the organization of athletic sports will bring the town and country together. Men who see in the schemes of special selling days a means of attractive and keeping the trade of their locality. There are great benefits to be derived from an association of the business men of any town, and no place should be without one if they intend to keep the business which rightfully belongs to them. An organization such as this would go a long way towards bettering business conditions in Walkerton. Why not form an association here?

Old Lady Lost.

There's a great marsh out in Osprey comprising some one thousand acres. At the west end of this marsh the road is partially opened from the 4th to the Centre Line. On Friday, May 28th, Mrs. Wm. Winters, 78 years of age, undertook to walk from the home of her son, David Winters, with whom she had been living, to the home of her brother, Jas. Sellers, Centre Line. She appears to have wandered off the road and become lost in the big marsh. Her disappearance was not made known until Monday of last week, when searching parties went out to try and locate her. This search was kept up all of last week without result, and at time of writing her whereabouts had not been discovered, although traces of her wanderings had been found. Her satchel was picked up in the marsh by one of the searchers. Of course all hope of her being found alive had long passed, and the sad affair has cast a gloom over the neighborhood. She has been a widow for a number of years. A grand-daughter is attending the Flesherton high school. — Flesherton Advance.

Thursday Afternoon Sports.

The Thursday afternoon half holiday which is an innovation to Tara citizens was well observed by the business men on the first afternoon, which was last week. The event was well advertised through the Leader and no one came to Tara to do business with the exception of two persons. Most of our citizens spent the afternoon at the Pleasure Grounds where a green lacrosse match was the principal attraction.—Tara Leader.

Killed in Motor Wreck.

John Steele, manager of the Mount Forest Carriage Company was killed and his brother Harry was seriously injured on Friday afternoon at Listowel when their auto turned turtle. The machine which was a Ford struck a block of stove wood lying on the road and plunged into the ditch. John Steele died an hour later while his brother is expected to survive his injuries.

Orders for Shell Boxes

The Chesley Furniture Co has finished an order for 2000 boxes for shells and the Chair Co., completed an order for 5000. Recently the Furniture Co., received an order for 5000 more boxes and the Chair Co an order for a similar quantity. The big foundry is turning out 600 shrapnel shells a day, but these will not last long in actual warfare for we read recently that the French artillery used more shells in one day's fighting in the Arras region than have been made in Canada since the war began.—Chesley Enterprise.

Resents Insinuation.

We had a pleasant call last Saturday from Rev. J. J. Gehl of Formosa. The Dean is feeling quite keenly the insinuation that appeared in a local paper that he is not a loyal Britisher. Three of his brothers have enlisted in the Canadian contingents, one of them being in active service at the front, another en route to the continent, and the third in training at one of the Ontario Camps. There are few families in Ontario that are making greater sacrifices for the Empire, than the Gehl family, and it is therefore little wonder that the Rev. gentleman feels hurt when his loyalty is questioned.—Mildmay Gazette.

A vain women is sometimes mistaken when she thinks the whole world sees what she sees in her mirror.

Mr. Jas Flett was a business visitor in Walkerton last Tuesday. He tells us of seeing a letter from Capt McNally who is well known to Wiarton people. The Captain is in a hospital at Bologne France with a wound from a shrapnel shell a little above the knee. He expects to be alright again in about three weeks and will be glad to be back in the trenches again.—Wiarton Record.

Land Back, Keep Money.

J. G. Anderson of Lucknow, undertook to sell Alberta land to T. D. McQuaig and others for $20,700, but on the grounds that the purchasers had defaulted on the payments Anderson was given an order at Osgoode Hall last week setting aside the sale and declaring forfeited the money, paid, $10,440.73.

Barn Burned

Mr. Jos. McCallum, 10th con. Elderslie lost his barn and contents by fire caused from lightening during Monday afternoon's storm. The building contained a large quantity of hay and grain which was all consumed. A horse was in the barn when the fire started but was got out. There was $700 insurance on the building, and $800 on the contents in the Formosa Mutual Co.—Paisley Advocate.

35,000 More Canadian Troops

It was announced by the Militia Department last week that an appeal would immediately be made to recruit nearly 35,000 more men to go to the firing line in France. This new force will be composed of twenty seven regiments of infantry and six batteries of artillery, to be recruited from all parts of Canada. With the formation of this new force the number of men raised for active service by Canada will total upwards of 150,000. In the new contingent there will be four new Highland regiments, one recruited from Vancouver, Victoria and Winnipeg, a second from Ontario and two Highland regiments from Quebec and the maritime provinces.

The Potatoe

Everybody may think he or she knows the potatoes, but a perusal of Pamphlet No 2, issued by the Publication Branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, upon the Solanum tuberosum, will convince the same he or she that there is much to learn. A reprint from The Agricultural Gazette, official mouthpiece of the Department, the pamphlet is a collection of articles of superlative worth. Introduced by a brief historical statement showing the place the potato occupies in the world's domestic economy and especially that of Canada, by which it would appear that the crop is worth to this country upwards of $41,500,000 a year, we are presented with a complete exposition of the cultivation of the tuber by Mr. W. T. Macoun, Dominion Horticulturist. Mr. H. T. Güssow, Dominion Botanist, explains, first the diseases to which the potato is subject and how they can be controlled, and next, the results of inspection under the "Destructive Insect and Pest Act." Essays telling the story of potato production in each of the provinces by Secretary for Agriculture, Theodore Ross, of Prince Edward Island; Superintendent of Agricultural Societies, F. L. Fuller, of Nova Scotia; Secretary for Agriculture J. B. Daggett, of New Brunswick; Professor of Agronomy, Rev. H. Bois, Quebec; Professor T. G. Bunting of MacDonald College; Professor C. A. Zavitz, of Ontario Agricultural College Professor J. Bracken, of Saskatchewan; Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Geo. Harcourt of Alberta; Assistant Soil and Crop Instructor, W. Newton, of British Columbia, and the Secretary of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, give weight and importance and the highest expert countenance to the reprint, which is made complete by a report telling how potato-growing contests are conducted in Manitoba and by a table of the world's production for three years. This table shows Germany to be the greatest potato producing country and also that, excepting in Canada and the United States, the production is every on the decline. Everybody concerned in potato-growing will be interested in this pamphlet and should send for it to the Publications Branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

The well known horse, Comet which was taken ill at the Kincardine races on June 3rd., died on Monday. The horse was valued at about $600.

Sue Papers for Libel.

Col. Craig of Harriston has entered suit for liable against the editor of the Mount Forest Confederate and the Fergus News-Record for assertions made in their paper regarding the handling of money in connection with the soldiers. The colonel says that if a certain Toronto weekly were worth going after, he would enter similar proceedings against that paper also.

The "Glittering Lure".

"The Glittering Lure" is the title given by Bonnycastle Dale to a story of before-the season fishing in the opening pages of June Rod and Gun which is published at Woodstock, Ont., by W. J. Taylor, Limited. "Honest Weight" is an amusing tale of two rival fishermen as related by one of the French Canadian guides who accompanied them on their outing after "de beeg wan." "Three Swedes there were" is also a humorous story relating the experiences of a "vulgar, rambling trio" showing how everything turns to ashes to those without a purpose. "Sport in and around the Rocky Mountains," "Carefree Days in Newfoundland," etc. and the regular departments which latter are full of interest to the fisherman and gunner, make up a very interesting early summer issue.

Cargill Won The Trophy

A rink of Cargill bowlers came over yesterday and succeeded in capturing the Bowman trophy from R. J. Edgar's rink of Owen Sound by a score of 20 to 23 The game was closely contest but the visitors got the breaks of the luck. Also they bowled consistantly, gaining an early lead which they held to the end. It was only last Monday that Mr. Edgar's rink brought the trophy from Port Elgin the latter having taken it from Chesley a short time previously. Now it is in Cargill. It is probably it will not remain their long. The rinks in the game yesterday were as follows:

Owen Sound	Cargill
Jas. Buzz	John Clancy
Dr. Holmes	Jas Garland
J. C. Telford	M. L. Zeigler
R. J. Edgar, skip	C. W. Kerling skip

The trophy has been challenged for by several rinks already and they will be played in the following order: Wiarton, Paisley, Chatsworth, Southampton, Chesley, Port Elgin and Owen Sound.—O. S. Sun.

When War Shall Cease.

When war shall cease, and we shall "Eat and be strong. The food you take today

From the hearts' blood of heroes has been grown
They come from near and far (across the gray
And heaving seas) to make this land your own!
Eat ye, and like to them be true and brave
The wronged to suffer and the weak to save!"

Old Country News

WARLIKE SOCIALISTS.

London Cable.—(Correspondence of The Associated Press)—The Socialist National Defence League has been organized by a pro-war group of Socialists, including John Hodge, M. P., Robert Blatchford, the writer, A. H. Headingly, one of the leaders of the Social Democratic Party, George H. Roberts, M. P., Charles Duncan, M. P. and H. G. Wells, the novelist, to combat the Keir Hardie and Ramsay Macdonald anti-war group.

"In this hour of national peril," says the manifesto, prepared by the league, "when the independence of peoples is brutally menaced and the established public law and liberties of Europe are ruthlessly violated, a handful of pseudo-Socialists in this country are breaking the national solidarity and weakening the national effort in the face of the enemy. It has become a duty for true British Socialists to expose and repudiate the errors of these dreamers. All of them are, consciously or unconsciously, the agents of German Kaiserdom and traitors to the imperishable ideals of liberty and democracy which have united free Britain, independent Belgium and Republican France in an indissoluble and glorious alliance."

In the manifesto the following attack is made on German Socialism:

"What is the German claim? Put briefly, it may be summed up in the assertion that because an unwilling Serb-Austrian subject killed an Austrian prince, Austria had the right to ravage the Serbs; and because Russia intervened to prevent Serbian annihilation, Germany was justified in exterminating the national independence of Belgium.

"Civic freedom and national independence are elementary principles of Socialism. We cannot treat with German Socialists until they declare for these as the Socialists of Russia have declared. Socialism expresses itself internationally. It cannot develop anti-nationally.

"German Socialism has always been limited by political immaturity and bureaucratic ideals. The present war is a choice between organized liberty and mere organization."

British pro-war Socialists have made much of Liebknecht, the German Socialist who fought the war budget in the Reichstag, while German Socialists united for the Fatherland treat Hardie and Macdonald as heroes.

NO SHORTAGE THERE.

London Cable.—(Correspondence of The Associated Press)—While hundreds of appeals for field glasses appear in the personal columns of the London papers in behalf of young officers at the front, the followers of the races still have plenty of binoculars with which to view the horses. A picture of the grounds at Newmarket, showing the crowd with glasses to eyes following the race, appears in one of the London newspapers, while below appears the appeal for these instruments, made by Lady Roberts. Commissioned officers must largely furnish their own kit in the British army, and their pay is only nominal. Glasses are naturally out of the reach of the non-commissioned officers. One of the last acts of Lord Roberts was an appeal to sportsmen for glasses for the front, and before leaving on his trip to France he wrote a second appeal, which was found after his death.

WANT COMMERCE MINISTER

London Cable.—At the annual meeting of the Association of Trade Protection Societies a resolution was passed urging the establishment of a Ministry of Commerce and expressing the belief that such a Ministry would have prevented many of the difficulties which have arisen during the recent months.

The matter has been taken up by several newspapers, and although the question of cost is considerable, it is urged that the work now being done partly by the Foreign Office, the Board of Trade and the Colonial Office would, if co-ordinated and consolidated in a single branch, greatly assist in the extension of British trade and at the same time smooth the contraband difficulties which traders in almost every branch of commerce are suffering from at the present time.

MANKIND IN THE MAKING

(From the Scientific American.)

The history of mankind in the rock record is still far from complete, and this is especially so in regard to its early chapters. Most of what we have gleaned on this head is in the nature of inference drawn from the rude stone weapons which have survived him, leaving no trace of their makers.

The discovery of the now famous fragments of an indubitably human skull at Piltdown, in Sussex, which was first announced at a meeting of the Geological Society of London on December 18, 1912, was, therefore, an event of epoch-making importance, for not only was it found in association with rude stone weapons of the type known as "eoliths," and with remains of animals of older types than any hitherto associated with early man, but it displayed features more primitive, more ape-like, than any yet discovered. Still more recently a further find has been made of a crude sort of spear-head, made from the thighbone of an elephant. This was obtained from the same area as the skull itself, and from its highly mineralized condition there can be little doubt that this was wielded by the Piltdown man or his contemporaries. Since the precise geological age of this skull is still a matter for debate, as to whether it is to be regarded as of very late pliocene or early pleistocene, it will be more profitable to discuss in these pages those features of the skull itself which have made it of such supreme importance as a "missing link" in the chain we are endeavoring to forge.

These bones of contention, as such they speedily became, represent the roof and back of the skull, the temporal bone, with the great triangular brain lodging the internal ear, and, externally a part of the bony arch which runs forward to the eye, and last, but by no means least, the lower jaw, or rather the right half, containing the molar teeth. Later a relatively huge canine tooth turned up, of which more anon.

As Dr. Smith Woodward pertinently remarks, when it is remembered that Eoanthropus, Dawson and Homo Heidelbergensis are almost, if not absolutely, of the same geological age, we are led to the interesting conclusion that at the end of the pliocene epoch the representatives of man in Western Europe were already differentiated into widely divergent groups.

The skull is no less remarkable when compared with the other undoubtedly ancient human skulls, and suggests conclusions of even wider significance. The discoveries of the brain-case of that curiously ape-like man, Pithecanthropus, in Java, some years ago, and of several of the skulls of the Neanderthal or Neanderthaloid type, have led to the assumption that early man was characterized by a low, flattened forehead, and a beetling brow, like that of adult existing apes. But the Piltdown specimen, Dr. Smith Woodward points out, is certainly the oldest typically human skull yet found, yet it has a forehead as steep as modern man, [illegible] by no means [illegible] forehead. This latter fact has led to the suggestion that this skull is that of a female, and the small backward extension of the area for the masticating muscles is held as an additional token supporting this conclusion. This, of course, may be so; but on the other hand we have to take into consideration the enormous thickness of the skull wall, which, to the very [illegible] goes far to account for the small size of the brain.

All the evidence goes to show, then, that at least one type of man with a high forehead was already in existence in Western Europe long before Mousterian man. It is curious to remark however, that this high-browed man had a lower brain than the Piltdown man. This apparent discrepancy is explained by the almost inevitable conclusion that the Piltdown man is the direct ancestor of modern man, while the Mousterian or Neanderthal man was an offshoot from this stock. In regard to the brain there are one or two features of quite exceptional interest. In the first place the width exceeds that of any modern skull [illegible] measured by some twenty millimetres. So wide a difference indicated either an error in the work of reconstruction or some structural peculiarity so far unsuspected.

Having carefully considered the problem in the course of a restoration that I had undertaken to check, as it were, the results of Dr. A. Smith Woodward, I came to the conclusion that some structural peculiarity was to be sought for and this I speedily found in the exceptional length of the petrous portion, which proves to be no less than ten millimetres longer than in any modern skull. Thus, adding this increase of the two sides together, the abnormal width was exactly accounted for. This increase has been accomplished by a curious change in the parietal region of the skull for the [illegible] and lower border of this region, somewhat about the level of the top of the ear, and a little behind it in the living subject, has been thrust outward. Hence the striking difference between the Piltdown and modern skulls when seen from behind, for in the modern skull the widest part is [illegible] above the base.

The restoration which I undertook was the first to effect a reconstruction of the floor of the brain-case, and to show the position of the nerve apertures and the apertures for the blood vessels and, hence the interior of this it has been possible to take a fairly accurate cast of the brain. In attacking this problem I may mention that this building up of the skull base formed the foundation of my restoration. This completed, the remaining portion of the skull was fitted on to it. The result was a skull differing only in minute details from the original restoration of Dr. A. Smith Woodward, which, [illegible] Keith, [illegible] considered.

The most conspicuous feature of this skull, when seen from the side, is the low, receding dome, and the slight development of the brow ridges. The latter feature is brought even more forcibly home when the skull is seen from the front, or from above. This is really surprising, for these ridges in the earliest fossil man, known as the Neanderthal race, are enormously developed, recalling those of the gorilla and the chimpanzee. In the Piltdown race [illegible] of to-day.

The face must have presented an extremely ape-like appearance, owing to the enormous size of the jaws. The nasal bones, however, were negroid, not ape-like. The really ape-like characters are concentrated in the lower jaw. So much so is this the case that there are some who have gone to ridiculous lengths to show that this was really that of an ape, and had nothing to do with the skull. Needless to say, such opinions were expressed only by those unfamiliar with the problems of comparative anatomy and paleontology.

That this jaw did belong to this skull is not a matter for dispute. Its simian features should not occasion surprise, having regard to the age of the skull, and the relatively small size of the brain. Compared with that of a modern European its most striking feature is the absence of a "chin," that is to say, of the projection of its lower border, which in modern skulls protrudes beyond the level of the cutting teeth or incisors. In this, however, it agrees with the jaw found some years ago at Heidelberg and known in consequence as the Heidelberg jaw. About the human nature of this there is no doubt, for the character of the teeth renders any other interpretation impossible.

Omitting reference to many other somewhat technical details presented by the Piltdown jaw we may turn now to the teeth. The simian, or apelike characters of these is very striking, both in regard to their shape and their arrangement in the jaw. As in the ape the cheek teeth or molars, and premolars, are placed in a straight line one behind the other instead of in a curve, as in modern human jaws. When the jaw was first found the premolars, canine or eyeteeth and the cutting or incisor teeth were missing. Nevertheless, Dr. Smith Woodward, in his restoration, ventured to introduce a large canine.

The critics scoffed and pointed out the absurdity of such a venture. Unfortunately for them the missing tooth turned up shortly after. Attempts were then made to show that it could not have belonged to this jaw, but a more careful study of the find seems to have convinced them that they were hopelessly wrong in their pronouncements. But whether or no there can be no doubt but that it is one of the missing series. And the most wonderful thing of all is that, when the tooth came to be compared with the tooth postulated by Dr. Smith Woodward, it was found to differ only in minute details. It differs absolutely from the canine of any known ape, and no less from that of any human tooth yet found known. In some respects it recalls the canine of the milk series, which is what one would expect.

While the skull is essentially human, that is to say, it is the skull of a member of the genus homo, though representing a man of low grade, the jaw, on the other hand, as we have already remarked, is almost that of an ape. On this account these remains must be regarded as representing a new genus of mankind which Dr. Smith Woodward has named Eoanthropus. Or to give it its full name, Eoanthropus Dawsoni, in honor of Mr. Chas. Dawson, who discovered the first of the fragments.

The form of the roof of the skull, of the brow-ridges, and of the temporal bone admit of no doubt as to the human character of these remains. What is known of the petrous portion of the last named bone and the nature of the articular cavity of the lower jaw, differ only in minute points from the same areas in modern man.

No estimate as to the form of the skull, and the cranial, that is to say the brain, capacity of this skull could, of course, be made until the remains were pieced together. Toward the fulfilment of this task certain fixed points were at once available. Thus the frontal bone retained a portion of the outer border of the eye-socket, while the hinder portion of this skull-cap could be positively connected with the bones forming the back of the skull; this gave the approximate length of the cranium. There was another constant point of contact with the temporal bone and the parietal. This enabled a fairly accurate estimate to be made of the height of the skull. Its width, a measurement of great importance, has formed the subject of much controversy, though as a matter of fact there can be little room for doubt even on this score, as to the exact position of the middle line of the skull-cap. That this has been fixed by Dr. A. Smith Woodward and Professor Elliot Smith there can be no question, but Professor Keith, of the Royal College of Surgeons, insists that this line has been placed too far to the left, thereby materially lessening the size of the brain case, and, as a consequence, the size of the brain, which he assures us is greater than that of modern white races of to-day. That there is absolutely no evidence to support this view we have no hesitation in saying.

Tommy—Pop, what do we mean by a mere technicality? Tommy's Pop—A mere technicality, my son, is an important point made by another man in an argument, which we dismiss with a sneer.

Entire Family Stricken With Cholera.

Youngest Child Died.

The chief symptoms of cholera are vomiting, and purging occurs either simultaneously or alternately, and are usually sudden and very violent, and the matter ejected by the stomach has a bilious appearance and a nasty bitter taste. On the first symptom appearing Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken, and the trouble cured.

Mrs. E. Slade, 376 Logan Ave., Toronto, Ont., writes: "When I first arrived in Canada, nearly four years ago, my entire family was stricken with cholera, from which the youngest child died. Soon after a friend recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and acting on this advice I administered it to all who were suffering, with the most gratifying results. Since that first attack my children have been subject to stomach troubles, but on the first symptoms I resort to "Dr. Fowler's," and it always brings relief. I have immense faith in this medicine, and always keep a bottle on hand. Also I never fail to recommend it to anyone who is similarly troubled."

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" see that you get it.

It has been on the market for the past 70 years.

INCORRIGIBLE

(By Edith V. Ross.)

In ante-bellum days there were shooting matches among the gentlemen of the Southern States in defence of their honor, the causes of which were usually published to the world. But when a woman was the subject of dispute some other cause was invented in order to keep her name out of the matter. At times when the ingenuity of the participants failed them in inventing a cause they would resort to absurd expedients.

Miss Cary Randolph many years ago was a belle in Charleston, N. C. Among her suitors were Robert Fitz-Hugh and Percy Bryce, both South Carolinians. Miss Randolph was not averse to setting her suitors against one another. It gratified her amour propre. But in this case she went too far.

One day while she was walking with Fitz-Hugh, Bryce passed them. The lady smiled on him and invited him to join them. She knew that neither would relish the presence of the other, but this did not trouble her; she wished her friends to see her with one of the men who were known to be devoted to her on each side of her.

Having paraded her lovers before her friends, she turned in the direction of her home and on arriving there dismissed them. Had she asked them to come in with her there might have been no unfortunate result. Had she asked one of them in it would have been tantamount to an expression of preference. This, too, would have ended the matter, for they were both gentlemen, and either would have taken his dismissal as final. Leaving them to walk away together was the worst thing she could have done.

They proceeded some distance, remarking on the weather and such other makeshift topics; then when they were about to part Fitz-Hugh said to Bryce:

"I was surprised at your intrusion."

"The lady invited me."

"That was common politeness."

"If you think yourself aggrieved you have a right to reparation."

Both men were ready to explode, but Fitz-Hugh repressed his feelings for the time, and, turning on his heel, walked away. As he proceeded jealousy got the better of him, and, seeking his friend Walter Raymond, he commissioned him to take a challenge to Bryce. Raymond asked the cause, and when told of it replied that he would have nothing to do with an affair that would bring in the name of a lady, whereupon Fitz-Hugh told him to make up a pretext to be given to the world as the cause of the duel. Raymond, after some thought, decided that the ostensible reason for the quarrel was to be that Bryce had called Fitz-Hugh a redhead. Fitz-Hugh's hair was auburn. This was not a reason calculated to deceive the public, but Raymond had no inventive genius, and it was the best he could do.

Miss Randolph had made choice between these two men a very decided choice. She was ready to give herself to one of them. But she desired to prolong the pleasure of being courted by both and make herself more valuable to the man she loved by rendering her winning more difficult.

Despite the effort made to keep the coming meeting a secret from her, she got word of it. On the morning appointed for the duel she mounted a horse and rode to the grounds, arriving there just in time to see the rivals for her hand standing facing each other with deadly intent. Her presence put a stop to the proceedings.

"I have heard," she said, "that one of the gentlemen is about to kill the other. Since I have made up my mind to accept a proposal of marriage from one of you I object to the other killing him."

The rivals glared at each other, but said nothing. The seconds, who were opposed to the meeting, saw an opportunity to stop it where it was.

"Perhaps," said Bryce's seconds after an awkward pause, "Miss Randolph will listen to [illegible] the cause of the quarrel."

"What is the cause?" asked the lady.

Again there was a pause, more awkward than the first, at the end of which Fitz-Hugh's seconds said that his principal had been insulted by being called a redhead. If Miss Randolph would decide whether Mr. Fitz-Hugh's hair was red it would end the matter.

"Mr. Fitz-Hugh's hair is a fiery red," she said, "but that has nothing to do with my preference."

Fitz-Hugh colored. "Gentlemen," he said, "I see no reason why this affair should not proceed."

"Nor I," added Bryce.

Miss Randolph made no interposition until one of the seconds had given the word "Ready" and the other stood ready to give the signal to fire by dropping a handkerchief. This man expecting that Miss Randolph would indicate her preference, delayed, keeping an eye upon her.

She smiled at him.

"This is absurd," he said. "Do you intend to risk losing the man you love?"

"How can I?" she said, "in such a public fashion?"

"Gentlemen, take your places," said the second.

Every man except the principals closed his eyes. Hearing a laugh [illegible] they [illegible] opened them to see Miss Randolph walking away with her arm through that of Mr. Fitz-Hugh.—Troy Times.

Her Nerves Were So Bad Thought She Would Go Out of Her Mind.

Mrs. Hollis Knox, 45 Harding St., St. John, N.B., writes: "I suffered greatly with my nerves, I could not sleep at night, nor work, and the least little thing worked on my mind and bothered me. FA[illegible] GARDEN

SILAGE AND FODDER VALUES.

In every 100 pounds of corn silage will be found approximately 21 pounds of dry matter. There is a large amount of water conserved, which is lost by fodder during the curing process, thus giving the field-cured corn plant about two and a half times as much dry matter. The food constituents contained in 100 pounds of silage consist of the following: [illegible] pounds protein, [illegible] pounds of carbohydrates, seven pounds fat. While it will be seen at once that it is necessary to feed a good deal of silage in order to get much actual substance, it will be remembered that the outstanding value of this food is its succulence and laxative effect on the digestive system of the animal.

Almost without exception, the herd of cows that is fed on silage will be found to be in better flesh condition than the one that [illegible] and has had to depend on dry fodder. While animals may be supplied with all the water they care to drink, even in cold weather there seems to be a much more [illegible] when a considerable portion of the water needed to supply the system is taken in the form of plant juices. Herein lies the principal value of silage.

In field-cured corn there is about [illegible] pounds of dry matter to every 100 pounds of [illegible]. Practically the same amount of dry matter is found in field-cured stover. The analysis of corn fodder will vary considerably, depending on the amount of corn contained on the stalks. Professor Henry gives the number of pounds of food elements in every 100 pounds of fodder corn as follows: [illegible] pounds protein, [illegible] pounds carbohydrates, and 1.2 pounds fat. In corn that has been drilled and the ears have been crowded so that only nubbins are formed, there is likely to be found less dry matter than where ears have been allowed to develop, otherwise the analysis of the fodder in either case will be very similar since the relation of food elements found in the ear is very close relative to that found in the stalk.

Corn stover, which is merely the stalks and leaves alone, naturally has less feeding value, and the analysis is as follows: 1.7 pounds protein, [illegible] pounds carbohydrates and 1 pound fat. This shows that it contains only about half as much protein and fat as the fodder. Again, the food value of stover is liable to great variation, due to the effect of the weather. Stover that has been out all winter, subject to the bleaching and leaching effects of the elements, will be found to be quite unpalatable, and of not very much value, except as a filler to be used as part of the roughage fed.

What has been said of stover will apply to the stalks in the field. Early in the season, soon after the corn has been removed the stalks furnish practically their maximum amount of food nutrients. Later on the value of the stalks for feed is practically worthless. [illegible] it is not uncommon to see stalk fields where the stalks have been eaten nearly down to the butts.

Successful dairying rests largely on the judicious use of the corn plant, and where it is not possible to make it into silage the next best thing is to "fodder" as much as possible. A good many careful farmers feed considerable fodder corn to their horses, though when it is used for such purposes it should be as free from dust as possible. In this case the corn should be [illegible] unless only such amount of fodder is fed as to furnish what grain the horse would be fed in his box. Too much stover can be fed horses, and in this case it makes a very rough coat, especially on the driver.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS

Every rotation should be planned so that one or more legumes will occupy the land one or more times during [illegible] years. The legumes will enrich the soil in nitrogen and make it produce a large crop of non-legumes, such as corn, oats, wheat and grass.

Leguminous plants are the ones the farmer should aim to grow, for when he gets a good stand of clover or alfalfa half the battle is won. Yes, eternal vigilance must be the slogan of the successful farmer.

Commercial fertilizers are all right, and we must have them judiciously applied, but they can never take the place of lime and barnyard manure.

The horse troubled with heaves should be fed a ration consisting largely of grain, at least as much grain as hay by weight. The grain should be fairly laxative and the hay free from dust. Sometimes good results are obtained by sprinkling the hay with lime-water just before feeding to the horse.

Clean milk is the most important [illegible] of the dairy. It is valuable as a food for human beings. It is invaluable for pigs and chickens. It has all the [illegible] value and half the [illegible] of whole milk. [illegible]

Without a knowledge of the feeding values of the various feeds it is a very difficult matter to feed stock economically. In former times when animals were [illegible] on the range where [illegible] was abundant they secured naturally a balanced ration. But this is no longer possible. We must raise the feeds on expensive land with expensive equipment and by high-priced labor. As a result it costs more to feed animals. Failing to raise the feed we must buy it, and add the cost of transportation. This means that we cannot afford to feed indiscriminately. Where this has been done animal husbandry has been unprofitable.

At the Iowa experiment station lambs fed on sweet clover hay, corn and oil meal made an average gain of [illegible] pounds, while on the same ration, except the substitution of native grass hay in place of the sweet clover, the gains were 20.3 pounds. These results furnish more evidence that the farmer who can grow sweet clover need not lack an abundance of good forage and hay.

At a meeting called by the Boston Chamber of Commerce and the Vermont Commissioner of Agriculture, at Rutland, Vermont, to see if something could not be done to bring the price of milk paid the producer and that paid the consumer near each other, the cost of production was presented by a number of farmers. The result showed that the 20 Ayrshire cows averaged 4,725 quarts of 3.95 per cent.; milk at an average cost, for food consumed, of $80.16, with additional cost of other expenses amounting to $133.65, making the average cost of production amount to 2.83 cents per quart, or about $1.42 per 100 pounds of milk.

A common experience with a first seeding of alfalfa, where good seed and a thorough preparation of the soil has been secured, is a thick stand soon after the plants come up, a fair stand through the first year of haymaking, many bare spots the second year, and a thin stand at the beginning of the third or fourth year. When the stand of alfalfa gets so thin that the yield is not profitable, the land should be plowed deeply and planted to a cultivated crop like corn or potatoes. It will pay to give more than the usual amount of cultivation, so that the soil will be put in good condition in regard to the filth and moisture.

Mangels ought to be a part of every farm crop where stock is kept. Many farmers imagine that it is a hard crop to raise, but it is a mistake. A good way to raise them is to sow in rows thickly and transplant about the 1st of July 8 or 10 inches apart in a freshly-plowed piece of land. Two or three boys can transplant several thousand a day. One boy goes ahead making holes with a dibble, while two others follow, one carrying the plants and the other dropping them into the holes. On good land as high as 800 bushels can easily be raised. Cows and sheep thrive on them.

Dogs of Ancient Lineage.

Some breeds of dogs are of comparatively modern origin. But when it comes to determining the ancestry of such a dog as the toy spaniel difficulties in plenty are encountered. The toy is one of the oldest breeds in the world, boasting a proud line of ancestry that carries it back at least 2,000 years and then is apparently lost in antiquity. Another dog as old is the Maltese terrier of Europe, a breed that enjoyed the favor of the highborn women of Rome and Greece a thousand years before the Christian era.

CAMPHOR'S TRAIL OF BLOOD.

The Cost in Human Lives for Gathering the Pungent Drug.

Every drop of camphor you use is estimated to have cost at least its weight in human blood. There are few things which demand a heavier toll of lives than this pungent drug, which is so widely used for keeping moths out of our clothes and for making liniments and other remedies.

The reason for this is that the mountainous parts of the island of Formosa, from which the world gets most of its camphor, are inhabited by head hunting savages, whom the successive invaders of the island have been unable to subdue.

These savages are quite alive to the value of the camphor trees and fiercely oppose all attempts to get possession of the forests. Their hostility makes the gathering of camphor a most hazardous occupation and one in which a loaded rifle is the most indispensable tool.

Since the Japanese took the island after their successful campaign against China in the nineties they have been carrying on a carefully conceived plan of gradual penetration of the valuable camphor regions. They make paths six feet in width through the virgin forests. At intervals of every 120 yards stands a guardhouse, and every fourth or fifth guardhouse is a small fort, entrenched and defended by barbed wire entanglements, such as are being used on the battle grounds of Europe. Telephonic intercommunication, machine guns and all the resources of western military science are employed, and the line are pushed gradually forward.

In spite of these elaborate precautions, the loss among the camphor gatherers amounts to hundreds of deaths annually.

It is calculated that Formosa contains about a million camphor trees, some 10,000 of which are cut down every year. At this rate the supply will be exhausted in a hundred years, but when the country is thoroughly pacified there is no doubt that the Japanese will see that reafforestation is properly undertaken and an inexhaustible supply insured.

The savages who are making so much trouble are estimated to number about 120,000, and a further twelve years will, it is thought, be required to subdue them.—New York American.

Marcy and His Patch.

Credit is usually given to General Jackson for saying, "To the victors belong the spoils," whereas W. L. Marcy of New York actually made the phrase which cut a big figure in the Tyler-Cass-Van Buren battle. Marcy was perhaps the most bitterly caricatured American prior to Lincoln. He was usually represented with a patch on his trousers labeled 50 cents. That was the sequel to a bill for that amount which he rendered to his state for having had his clothing mended.—Philadelphia Ledger.

WORRY AND WEAKNESS

Often Indicate Over-work, and a Run Down Nervous System.

Overwork and worry have an evil effect on the system and often give rise to nervousness and sleeplessness. Other signs include a weak back, headaches and indigestion. In time if matters are neglected a complete breakdown of the nervous system follows. On every hand one can observe victims of this state of nervous exhaustion who are at a loss to know what to do with themselves, their nervous debilitated state having baffled all ordinary treatment.

If you are a victim of exhausted nerves, if your symptoms are as described above, you need Dr. Williams' Pink Pills because they are a powerful nerve tonic. Their strengthening action on weak nerves is due to the fact that they enrich and build up the blood through which the nerves are fed. Under the tonic influence of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills all traces of nervous weakness disappear together with the headaches, the insomnia, the feeling of intense weakness and depression of spirits that mark the victim of nervous ailments. Here is the proof. Mr. Henry Marr, Port Felix, N. S., says: "It gives me greatest pleasure to testify as to the value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. When I began their use I was a physical wreck; my nerves were all unstrung. I suffered from frequent headaches and backaches, and was almost wholly unfitted for work. I had tried several remedies without success, when I finally decided to give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a trial. I took six boxes and they made me a well man."

What these Pills did for Mr. Marr they will do for every other weak and nervous man, if given a fair trial. Sold by all medicine dealers or sent by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 by writing The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

It's one thing for a girl to accept a man, but quite another matter to take him at his own valuation.

THE POULTRY WORLD

SUCCESS IN REARING CHICKS.

[illegible] to properly grow poultry is much larger than is generally supposed. It is true that many beginners do have a fair hatch, either by the incubator or under the hen, and do succeed in having a fair average of these hatched live and reach maturity. But it is safe to say that one-half the chicks raised each year [illegible] properly. At some time, either during incubation, brooding or even after they have attained the age of five weeks, a chick when received, due to some neglect in the management. Weather conditions at times may have a tendency to check growth. The properly-grown chick never stops from shell to maturity and to insure this steady growth a great many small things are factors.

Taking it for granted that the parent stock is of the best, fowls that have never been ill, fowls that during the hatching season are at their best, then if an egg which will produce the future chick is carefully taken care of, there is a good chance of success in incubation. The hatching egg is not always taken care of in one cause for weak chicks if they incubate. Then comes the improper handling of the chicks in the brooder. One may claim that poor results come even with the hen which is many times true. While it is a fact that it is hard to go nature one better, nevertheless all hens are not perfect, and they, too, can be poor in both the incubation of the egg and the rearing of the chick. Man must always be the manager. If hen-hatched chicks, care of the hens and chicks in a large degree falls to the keeper. Proper food, water and shelter must be given for best results, a careful lookout for lice and a constant fight against these poultry pests waged. With the brooder-raised chicks few lice will ever be found, but the brooder must be cleaned often, and sprayed now and then with some good [illegible].

The common practice of placing too many chicks in the brooder, no matter what make, should be avoided. Even the large coal oil or oil-burning hovers with a rated capacity of from 300 to [illegible] chicks, one will find that better results are obtained when about half the number is placed under these hovers. Too [illegible] or too little heat are factors against the steady growth of the chicks. Under[illegible] or overfeeding, especially when young, are important factors to be reckoned with. Water is a small thing in the minds of many, especially the beginner, yet water is one important essential in the development of the chick. One often sees the drinking pan or crock in the hot sun with water so warm that the growing chicks drink only when compelled to.

Good management is the only secret of success in poultry-raising. Neglect of [illegible] spells failure, yet in almost every case the failure to succeed is caused by just these small things omitted from the system, if a system is used at all. At times one can find a well-equipped poultry yard lacking in grass or green food in some form and shade. Everything in there except these two requirements, and a drawback is noticed because [illegible] just two in the way of many essentials that go to make a full success of poultry [illegible]. The beginner questions if all these small items are so important, and [illegible] many poultry-keepers who have grown fowls with success without some of them. But they have not accomplished success in the fullest measure, and the profits derived from the flock are not so great as that from the flock which has had the best of management. It is this management that makes the great difference in the profits of the flocks and in the rapid growth of the young stock and low death rate. No two poultry-keepers make the same profits, and the larger the profits the better managed the flock is.

The essentials that go toward success in the growing of chicks are, first, proper incubation from eggs from stock of known merit, the proper brooder and proper accommodations, the right degree of heat, especially for the first ten days or two weeks, 90 to 95 degrees the first week, never higher or lower than 90, and plenty of ventilation; second, good feed, starting the chicks, if possible, on sour milk (milk in this form is good). Pinhead oatmeal and good chick grains can be fed the second day in the brooder. A box of dry bran can be placed before them the third day, and at the end of ten days the regular dry mash, containing bran, middlings, ground oats, meal[illegible], [illegible] and beef scraps. Bone meal in [illegible] is a good addition. Oyster shell, charcoal and grit should be placed before them at all times.

With good feeding and proper management of the brooder the growing of chicks without a check should not be the hard task so many find it. But to neglect the essentials that go toward success is to invite partial or a complete failure.

DON'T OVERFEED CHICKS.

Government poultry specialists say that overfeeding is more dangerous to young chicks than underfeeding. They advise the feeding of chicks from three to five times daily depends upon the owner's experience in feeding. Undoubtedly the little ones can be grown faster if fed five times each day. At no time, however, do they deem it wise to feed more than barely enough to satisfy the appetite and to keep the chicks exercising, except at the evening or last meal of the day, when they should be given all they will eat. Greater care must be exercised not to overfeed young chicks that are confined than those that have free range, as leg weakness is liable to result.

Your chicks may be fed any time after they are 36 to 48 hours old, whether they are with a hen or in a brooder. The first feed may contain either hard-boiled eggs, johnnycake, stale bread, pinhead oatmeal or rolled oats, these feeds are given alone or in combination. It is of value in giving the chickens a good start in life but the mixture should be fed in a crumbly mass and not in a sloppy condition.

After the chicks are two months old they may be fed four times daily, and after three months old, three times daily. Johnnycake, composed as follows is very good for young chicks: One dozen infertile eggs or one pound of sifted beef scrap to ten pounds of corn meal; add enough milk to make a pasty mash, and one tablespoonful of baking soda. Dry bread crumbs may be mixed with hard boiled eggs, making up about a fourth of the mixture eggs, or rolled oats may be used in place of the bread crumbs.

Some poultrymen feed the bread crumbs, rolled oats or johnnycake mixture five times daily for the first week, then gradually substitute for the ration one or more of the following feeds: finely cracked grains of equal parts by weight, of cracked wheat, finely cracked corn, pinhead oatmeal or hulled oats, to which about 5 per cent charcoal, millet or rape seed may be added. A commercial chick feed may be substituted if desired. The above ration can be fed until the chicks are two weeks old, when they should be placed on grain and a dry or wet mixture.

After the chicks are 15 days old a good growing mash composed of two parts by weight bran, two middlings, one corn meal, one low-grade wheat flour or red dog flour, and 10 per cent. sifted beef scrap, may be fed either wet or dry; if wet only enough moisture (either milk or water) should be added to make the feed crumbly, but not sloppy. When this growing mash or mixture is not used, a hopper containing bran should be always accessible to the chicks.

EGG FOODS FOR POULTRY.

What shall I give my poultry to start them laying? is a question many poultry raisers are asking. The idea is prevalent that pullets should have some condiment stimulant or special feed that will stimulate the egg producing organs into activity, but as a general thing a well-balanced ration is all that is necessary. Condiments are beneficial; they are necessary for hens as for human beings. A mash or bran and ground grain, without salt or other condiment would be insipid and tasteless. When on free range the hens can easily supply all the condiments she needs, with the exception of salt, but when she is confined we must supply them. The condiments given poultry are more for the purpose of increasing the appetizing quality of the food than as a stimulant or tonic, and are usually restricted to salt, mustard, pepper and ginger. Onions, winter radishes, turnips and beets fed in the mash have the same beneficial effect as pepper and ginger: they give the mash a pungent taste and the fowls relish it. Pepper, ginger and mustard when given in sufficient quantities or doses are stimulants.

There are many conditions powders, egg foods and other stimulants on the market that are used to increase egg-production. Any direct nutritive value these prepared foods may have is due to the common feeding stuffs they contain and quantities fed are too [illegible] to cause any considerable gain in production. Their direct value is due to some [illegible] of the [illegible] with which they are fed, which increases digestion. The increased appetite that often follows the use of a conditional food or poultry powder might be secured by any change of diet, especially by the proper use of salt. Mild laxative effects may be obtained with green food and proper use if mashes in the diet.

I myself have never used any drugs, securing the best results, on the whole, by using only common condiments such as salt and occasionally a dash of cayenne pepper to give an insipid mash a taste. If the fowls are kept healthy by having clean quarters, fresh air, sunshine, pure water, and good wholesome food, they will need no tonic to induce them to lay if they are of a laying strain; if they are not it is better to discard them than to force egg production.

NOTES.

May is an ideal hatching month and one of the months that chicks, when given the proper care, develop fast. At this time fertility is good, and, with cool nights as a rule and warm days, the average poultry raiser should have but little trouble in getting good results.

Little consideration is taken in the lice problem by poultry raisers, especially beginners, who, when the usual trouble comes, looks for everything else as the cause of poultry ills, except lice, which are always on the job in large or small numbers, according to the fight made against them. Chicks or the older fowls cannot do their best when lice are found in the quarters and on the fowls in large numbers. It is money thrown away to feed lice-infested fowls and expect them to do their best, either in growth or the producing of eggs.

Milk in any form is a great aid in starting chicks to rapid growth. It is in its best form sour, and is cheap at almost any price to start the young chicks with, especially for the first ten days to two weeks.

Green food for chicks is not given the attention by poultry keepers it should. Chicks and the older fowls have been profit-payers without it, but with it the profit could have been larger. Especially is green food essential in some form for the growing chicks, they will, if given plenty of it, grow quicker and stronger, with a lower death rate than those who are deprived of it.

Poultry keepers are quick to jump at conclusions, especially the beginner with one or two years' experience. The system laid out the first year may have worked fairly well, but that does not mean the system is a proven success, unless under the same conditions the results show the sameness for several years. There is much to learn in poultry, yet beginners jumping at conclusions, seem to think they have mastered the poultry problem in a few years.

WAR HORSES IN BATTLE.

Cavalry Mounts Revel in the Dash and Fury of the Charge.

It will probably surprise you, said a retired colonel of hussars, to learn that a cavalry horse usually enjoys a battle at least as much as his rider and displays as much courage in it. He will chafe and stamp with impatience while waiting for the order to charge, and at the signal will dash forward like a greyhound released from the leash, full of fire and fury and often neighing wildly. At the moment of contact with the enemy he will rear, striking and biting savagely at the opposing horses and trampling down the infantry.

When his rider falls he will dash along with his fellows and crash as gallantly into the foe. In the famous charge of the Light Brigade scores of riderless horses swept down the "valley of death," thundering through the smoke on to the Russian guns, and galloped back in safety with the shattered remnants of the brigade. Five horses raced neck and neck with Lord Alfred Paget, who rode in advance of the line, so eager were they to get at the enemy.

And not only is the well-trained charger as brave as his rider. He is often as intelligent. He knows the bugle calls just as well and answers them as promptly. In fact, I have known many a case in which a horse has put his rider right when he has mistaken an order and has gone faultlessly through a manoeuvre in spite of the efforts of the mistaken master to make him do the wrong thing.—London Tit-Bits.

Cunning of the Fox.

A fox on emergency will sham death to perfection. A master of hounds once noosed a fox in a whip as he bolted before a terrier. The fox appeared to have been strangled. When held up by the scruff of the neck his eyes were seen to be closed, his jaws gaped and the body hung limply down from the head. He was placed tenderly on the ground only to dash off to covert.—London Standard.

DOCTOR SAID ONLY HOPE WAS IN AN OPERATION

Was Skeptical When He Began the Use of Dr. Chase's Ointment—Relief Came Quickly

Here is a plain, honest statement in regard to Dr. Chase's Ointment. Between the lines of this letter you can read the gratitude which its writer feels. One does not suffer from annoying, distressing piles for ten years without appreciating a cure when it is obtained.

Almost every mail brings the report of someone who has been cured of piles by the use of Dr. Chase's Ointment. Such statements are never used without the permission of the writer, and until we are satisfied that the cure is genuine and the writer a person of responsibility.

You may believe in operations for piles, and think there is no other cure. Write to Mr. Ingles, enclosing stamp, and he will gladly verify his statement. He will tell you that the pain, the expense, the risk of an operation are quite unnecessary. That relief and cure come with the use of Dr. Chase's Ointment.

Mr. Ernest W. Ingles, Penticton, B.C., writes: "I suffered from piles for ten years, and though I tried all kinds of ointments and injections I really had no permanent relief until I used Dr. Chase's Ointment. When I began this treatment I had absolutely no faith in it, for I had been examined by a well known physician in Vancouver, and he said that an operation was the only thing that would benefit me. It was surprising the relief I obtained from the very first box, and now after using four boxes I am practically cured. My case was so exceptionally bad that I received no relief day or night, and for this reason the results are wonderful."

You can obtain Dr. Chase's Ointment from any dealer at 60 cents a box. If you do not want to risk this much send a two-cent stamp to pay postage, and mention this paper, and we shall send you a sample box free. We are so certain that any sufferer from piles will obtain relief by using this ointment that we do not hesitate to make you this offer. Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

Second Contingent in England

A despatch from Ottawa on Saturday last which appeared in the daily papers stated that the entire second Canadian Contingent had crossed the English Channel safely and were now encamped on the soil of France. This means that this force, of which several young men are members, will soon be on the firing line.

Cargill Wins Trophy

A Cargill rink of bowlers skipped by C. W. Keeling went to Owen Sound on Friday last and succeeded in winning the Bowman trophy, the score being 26-23. Cargill still hold the trophy but have received challenges from several clubs including Walkerton. The local club, however, is about seventh on the list and the cup will probably be in several towns before their turn to play for the silverware comes.

Captain McNally Writes

under cover pretty well and kept the men away from the [illegible]. But the Germans use a shell which we call the "whizzbang. You cannot hear it until it is almost past you and it explodes almost before you hear the whizz,

The shelling had stopped and I was leaning against a sandbag wall which just came level with the top of my head when suddenly I experienced a burning sensation just as if a red hot blacksmith's file had been drawn with the speed of lightning across the top of my head and one of these shells exploded just beyond. I took my cap off and found nothing but a few small holes about the size of pin heads. Of course it was only a close shave. I turned to go to a nearby dugout since the shelling was recommencing, when bingo! I felt a smart blow on my left thigh, I thought it was nothing for I have received good smacks from flat pieces of shrapnel before which did no damage. Soon, however, I felt the blood running and became rather curious. I found that I had a nice little wound in the left side of my left leg. After putting on a first-aid bandage, I sat in a dugout for a while intending to stick it out until night. In a short time I found my leg growing stiff and realized that in a few hours I would scarcely be able to limp and would have to be carried out.

There were altogether too many wounded lying around so I gathered up a bunch of those who could walk or crawl and got ready to go back.

Just then it struck me that I would have a chance to send you a German helmet so I went back into the communication trench and found a dandy. I took the khaki cover off and there was the brass spike and double eagle with an iron cross in the centre. I started to hobble back about [illegible] and while we followed the old German main trench we had only the shell fire to worry about, when we got further along where a section of it had been blown to bits, we had to crawl for half a mile through Jack Johnson and coal box holes, full of mud and water, ditches, etc., with the Germans sniping at us all the time.

The route was lined with dead and dying who had only slight wounds when they started out, proving what a brave man the German is when he has only wounded Britishers to shoot at. If they could not [illegible] they certainly could see the [illegible] on their heads and [illegible] that we pay no attention [illegible] white flag signals and [illegible] a whole week's washing [illegible] not shoot at those wounded.

I will not forget that [illegible] a long time, not so much because of what I suffered myself, dragging my game leg, but because of what the men with me, many with very serious wounds, endured. Often, I had to lie flat utterly exhausted and finally I found I could not get along any further with my German helmet and had to throw it away.

When we reached the old British line we were safe from rifle fire, but it is a long weary walk back to the dressing station, a mile in the rear, and I had nothing but a pick handle to help me along.

Arriving here our medical officer fixed me up and I went back to the clearing hospital for [illegible]. From here we were moved by motor ambulance 16 miles to the [illegible] hospital at Baille, arriving about [illegible] p.m. When I went to bed [illegible] my leg was fixed up and I could not bend my knee.

In the bed next to me was [illegible] who had been hit [illegible] shrapnel and was [illegible]. He was the Earl of Ross, a nephew of the [illegible].

The next evening we were put on board a splendidly equipped Red Cross train and in the morning we reached Boulogne. I was put in a room with Sir G. H. Burke a young [illegible] also of the Irish Guards [illegible] suffering from shrapnel head wounds. We had a fine time together for a day and a half and then they moved him to another room and put me on board a hospital ship. On account of stormy weather in the channel they held us until the following morning May 28th.

I used to think that man for man there were no races almost equal to the Anglo Saxon and the Celt. I [illegible] now. I have seen them fight. I have seen them terribly wounded and dying. As I came away on the 24th, I saw [illegible] who had [illegible] again and when I asked them how it was going or where they were hit they would smile up at us and tell me that the Huns had got them this time, then they wanted to know whether we were going to hold the trench. We had won and the quiet smile of satisfaction showed how glad they were to know that the sacrifice had not been in vain. Compared to the miserable specimens of German humanity who have passed through our dressing stations, with much less serious wounds, they are princes.

One German refused to believe he had been captured by the Canadians because he insisted that they had all been killed up at Ypres. What gullible fools they are! They don't like us even a little bit, for one prisoner told a medical officer that "British soldiers have mercy but Canadian soldier call me [illegible] and stick bayonet through me." A couple of days ago I saw a couple of young [illegible] bringing in a great big black whiskered husky wearing a bright new uniform. He claimed he came from Hanover, Germany and [illegible] the war. He certainly looked [illegible] he seemed scared to death.

Their artillery is wonderful, they handle their machine guns [illegible] and their snipers are good also and no cowards, but the German soldier is a poor specimen, especially when you consider that they have had at least two years training.

I am now in a very pleasant hospital in one of the magnificent residences that overlook the "Mall." We are quite close to the Admiralty arch that opens into Trafalgar square and at the other end of the avenue is Buckingham Palace which we can just see through the trees. The Viscountess Ridley flies around in a black and white blazer, making us as comfortable as possible. She has a splendid staff of nurses from one of the city hospitals. The one that looks after me has been in Canada and had a brother in McGill. Her name is Kitchener and she is a niece of the Secretary for War. I was around in an invalid chair yesterday and think I will be back in France soon, but the doctor is trying to convince me that there is still some shrapnel in the wound. The result of the X ray will be made known tomorrow and that will settle the argument about it, but I hope to get back.

If I had not written so much already I would tell you about Captain Roy Robertson. He is doing wonderful work out here, and Walkerton has good reason to be proud of him.

Yours etc.,

ARCHIE.

COMMUNICATION

To Editor, the Telescope

Dear Sir:

May I ask a little of your space to take exception to your remark concerning my evidence in the case of [illegible] vs McFarlane reported in your issue of the 10th, inst. You say that my "evidence was picked to pieces by Mr. Robertson for the plaintiff." Even the most violent partisan could not go so far as to say that my evidence was "picked to pieces." I do not, however, propose to argue the matter. Whether my account is correct or not, in law and in figures, will be settled at the trial of MacFarlane's action against Mr. McKay, and in the meantime it is not proper to discuss a matter awaiting the judgment of the court. I ask you to be good enough to publish this explanation so as not to prejudice my reputation in the eyes of the public.

Yours truly,

[illegible]

The aged lady's condition for a time was serious, but we are pleased to report that she is now recovering. Her daughter, Mrs. J. Hamilton of North Bay was called to her bedside and will spend some time with her.

Captain Trantor Killed

Captain Trantor, of Southampton, one of the senior officers of the 32nd who left with the first contingent was killed in the fighting in France last week. Captain Tranter was a well known and well liked young man. He was a brother of Miss Hazel Tranter a student of the Walkerton High School, while Sergeant Tranter who was killed two weeks ago was a cousin not a brother as stated in this paper. Miss Tranter who was about to try her exams left for her home on Saturday.

Captain Robinson Killed

In the casualty list of Saturday, among the list of officers killed, there appeared the name of a former Walkerton boy in the person of Capt. F. W. Robinson, familiarly known as "Fritz" He was the eldest son of Rev. S. F. Robinson of Strathroy, former rector of St Thomas church Walkerton. Capt. Robinson, at the time of his enlistment with the first contingent was accountant in the office of Hay&Co. Woodstock and as in Walkerton was a very popular young man. He was about 28 years of age. Lieut. "Bun" Robinson, a brother who also enlisted in the first contingent is serving at the Dardanelles with the Duke of Cornwalls Light Infantry.

Taken to Industrial School

Rev. D. McLennan was in Toronto last week in the interests of the Bruce County Children's Aid Society. He took with him, Wm. McDonald, a 12 year old orphan boy of Ripley whom it had been deemed advisable by the authorities to send to the Industrial School for training as there seemed to be none of his relatives willing to accept the responsibility of his upbringing. While in the city Mr. McLennan called to see Graham Saunders of Port Elgin, a little lame boy who is a ward of the Bruce Children's Aid who has been a patient in the Sick Childrens Hospital since February last. Although the lad's lameness is not much improved it is expected that he will leave the hospital this week and will be brought to Walkerton.

Weeds on Vacant Lots.

What undoubtedly constitutes a menace to those people who are making an honest effort to keep their places clean is the crop of weeds found growing on vacant lots and roadsides in and around our town. These vacant lots are often nothing more or less than nurseries and breeding places for all kind of weeds. These produce countless numbers of seeds, to be blown and scattered by the winds over the adjoining property. A glance at the conditions found in most of our towns will prove convincing that the farmer is not entirely to blame in the matter of weed seed production and distribution. In most towns there are bylaws covering the weed problem but too often they are not enforced. Those living in Walkerton should co-operate and do their bit in the war against weeds. Action should be taken at once and not deferred until the weeds ripen and scatter their seeds.

Played a Tie Game.

The first Northern League baseball match in this district was played at the exhibition grounds on Monday evening, Teeswater being the visiting town. The first two innings of the game were an exhibition of rather loose baseball, glaring errors being made by both teams. After this both teams played better ball, but at that Teeswater had it all over the locals and at the end of the eighth the score was 6-2 in favor of the visitors. Teeswater made no runs in the ninth and in their half of the final inning, with two men down, Walkerton rallied and with the assistance of the fans and some timely hits they managed to pull out of the hole and tied the score. The local team lined up:—c. A. McCartney, p. Lou Anderson, s. s. H. Runstadtler, 1st base, A. LaFrance, 2nd base M. Wilson, 3rd base F. Anderson, c field W. Smith, r field J. Russell, l f W Mullen The next league game will be played in Teeswater on Friday and Chesley plays an exhibition game here on Saturday afternoon at 3.30.

Bowling Notes.

Two games have been played in the senior ship series, Severight defeating McBurney and Klein defeating McNab. J. B. Huether took a rink to Cargill on Friday last and was five shots down after 18 ends, and on Monday visited Hanover, defeating a rink skipped by Ben Zinn, by one shot. Tom Pye's rink was defeated in Cargill on Tuesday by 4 shots. The Bowman trophy is now in Southampton, a rink from that town having taken it from Paisley on Tuesday afternoon being 7 up at the end of the game.

Minors Secured Keg of Beer

A local young man has been summoned to appear in police court on Tuesday next on a charge of giving booze to minors. These minors, some six or seven in number have also been subpoenied to appear as witnesses. The facts of the case have not yet been disclosed, but from information received, it appears that the youngsters in the case secured a keg of beer in some manner on Saturday 12th and taking it up the river, kept it on ice, for a jubilication the following day, Sunday. Who provided them with the booze has yet to be proved, but to say the least, something should be done to keep these minors away from the flowing bowl.

Refused to Play

The Mildmay football club is again on the outs with the W.F.A. and are in a similar predicament to that of the local club one year ago. Last year after winning the district from Walkerton in the unsportsmanlike manner as they did, they were pitted against Owen Sound and were ordered to play the first game at home and the final game in Owen Sound. This they did and the latter team won, as it was expressed at that time, by kicking the tar out of the Mildmayites. Consequently when the same conditions arose this season and they were ordered to play the last game in Owen Sound, again, the "Stars" remembered their "sore" spots and refused to play the first game which the W. F. A. ordered to be played in Mildmay on Monday evening. Had they won the toss as Walkerton did last year, the local enthusiasts would in no way blame them for the course they took, but as it is it looks very much as if they are quitters. The W.F.A. will however, no doubt abide by their first ruling and will probably awake to the fact that Walkerton was not altogether alone at fault last year. The crys of "quitters!" jeers and cat-calls are now floating Mildmay's way.

He Wanted a Wife.

A young man of the west ward who had imbibed rather freely on Tuesday afternoon, became possessed of the idea that he should have a wife of his own, and arming himself with a marriage license, hurried to the home where his prospective bride was employed. He was doomed to bitter disappointment, however, for the young women with whom he had been keeping company for some time would have none of him and he was ordered off the premises. Persisting in his intentions he became noisy and made himself obnoxious to the inmates of the house. Chief Ferguson was phoned for and when on his way to the scene, met the would-be groom, who poured his tale of woe into the ears of the Chief. The officer of the law then in conversation with the girl was informed that she would have nothing to do with her former beau and in consequence of this he threatened the young fellow with arrest if he again ventured near the residence where the girl was employed. He promised to remain away, but late in the evening again became a nuisance to the household and the Chief after arresting him took him before Magistrate Tolton, who remanded him to gaol until Saturday for a hearing.

Walkerton 9 Hanover 7.

The first junior O.A.L.A. game of lacrosse for this district was played at the exhibition grounds on Friday last, between Hanover and the local team Referee Henning started the game at 6.15 and the contest which followed was a very good exhibition of lacrosse. At the end of the first and second quarters, Hanover was in the lead, but in the third period Walkerton took the lead and maintained it, winning out by 9 goals to their opponents 7. In winning their first game the local boys, the majority of whom are more eligible to play juvenile than junior lacrosse, are deserving of great credit. They played a steady game and their win was a surprise to the majority of enthusiasts, particularly when it is considered that they were up against men like Kramp, Titmus, Hencke and Tindale, who have been playing intermediate lacrosse for the past three years. Kramp in goal for Hanover, played a great game and his stellar work saved his team from a more disastrous defeat. The teams lined up:—

McKay	goal	Kramp
Runstadtler	point	Titmus
Wettlaufer	cover point	Hencke
Moore	1st defence	Hoblott
Farrer	2nd "	Leaske
Russell	Centre	Tindale
Henderson	2nd Home	Devlin

The Work of Sympathizers.

A good many citizens of Canada are inclined to pooh pooh the constant rumors of threatened action on the part of German sympathizers in this country and some hold the government up to ridicule for the precautions which were taken to guard the buildings, stations, etc., which are vital to the national life of the country. That these precautions were necessary and timely was demonstrated on Monday when, in Windsor, Ont., German sympathizers, blew up the factory of the Peabody Overall Co'y., which is engaged on a million dollar order of uniforms for the British army. About $10,000 damage was done to the manufactory. Besides this on the same day twenty-six sticks of dynamite were found beneath the armory of that city. A time fuse had been connected with it, but, for some reason this had failed in its work and thus the building and the lives of several hundred soldiers were saved by a miracle. The authorities have in the past been somewhat lax in their dealings with the pro Germans, but this episode will probably cause a tightening of the reins

LETTER FROM PRIVATE HANLEY

The following very interesting letter was received from Private W. P. Hanley by his father, Mr. Timothy Hanley of Chepstow. Two weeks ago we reported that Private Hanley had been wounded, and he has since been a patient in the Royal Infirmary, Derby, England, where the letter was written.

Royal Infirmary, Derby, Eng.
June 1st 1915

Dear Father:

I am in the very best of health, outside of a little shrapnel in my right leg just below and back of the knee. I expect to be operated on today. It is not serious in any way, so don't worry. I expect to be going back to the firing line in about two or three weeks, or perhaps it may be to get another dose of shrapnel, hot lead or gas.

Getting wounded don't bother me in the least but I hope never to be in an attack where the gas is used. It is dreadful to watch the gas cases coming from the front. Every part of their body is moving, and there they are gasping for what air they can get hold of. The eyes and lungs are most affected by the gas. As soon as the patients arrive at the dressing station, perhaps two or three miles from the real firing line, the doctors pump oxygen into their lungs which relieves them and brings them back to consciousness.

After the patients suffering from different ailments get their temporary dressing or treatment, they are put into a Red Cross Ambulance. If he isn't able to help himself he is put on a stretcher by stretcherbearers and put in the ambulance. For lying patients, there is room for four in each ambulance, two on the top deck and two on the bottom. In a good many cases it is done under shell-fire. The Germans are hard after a dressing station, a Red Cross worker or a crippled soldier. I believe a child or woman would be their delighted aim to shell or throw a bomb at. When speaking this way I don't mean all the Germans, but the Prussian guards. These Prussians are a fairly tall and physical man, more daring than the other class of Germans, but cowards when it comes to a bayonet charge, unless they have about three or four to our one. The Canadians and British have no mercy for the Prussians. In very few cases will a Canadian take one of them a prisoner: it is always a fight to a finish. It was a savage Prussian that nailed one of the Canadian Sergeants to a barn door, with a bayonet driven through the poor fellow and through the door. Why should we show them any mercy?

I omitted telling you that after a soldier is wounded the hardest task is to be able to get safely to the dressing station. In many cases it has to be done in the darkness of night, but some venture in daylight under shell and rifle fire. The most tantalizing of all is the German sharpshooter. He places himself on the limb of the tree or in a hedge or tall grass. Anyplace to make it hard for recognition. They shoot our stretcher-bearers, wounded soldiers trying to make their getaway, or a head that they can see above the trenches. They are located very often and get their medicine.

The class to locate sharpshooters is the Gurkas, a Hindu, or Indian from India. They are the best fighting type of men that Great Britain has at the front for advancing on the enemy. They don't like the shrapnel or a rifle but when it comes to charging on the enemy, they are in the best of spirits. They have such a way of crawling along through the grass that they get upon the German trenches before being noticed. When crawling along the ground they place their curved knife between their teeth and when upon the Germans swing it for the neck and in no case do they miss their aim. The Germans call them the black devils and in most cases they run from them.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

The two women were thus left entirely alone and the days passed in silence and sadness.

Meantime Jacques lived under the influence of the spell that had sapped the strength, intellectual and moral, of Pierre Laurier, that had degraded his character and changed the brilliant artist into the helpless being who had resolved to seek relief from his misery in death.

Clemence, all the more dangerous from the sincerity of her passion, loved now as she had never loved before. In the fair and somewhat effeminate beauty of this young man she found the charm she had needed to captivate her stronger nature. She dominated him completely, and left him not a thought nor a feeling that was not inspired by her.

In the midst of this intoxication the time fixed upon for the departure of the de Vignes arrived, and Clemence, unable to support the thought of separating from Jacques, prepared to return to Paris. They left with regret this enchanting country which seemed made for love. But they consoled themselves by thinking that in the city they should have greater facilities for enjoying each other's society without restraint than here.

Their return to Paris produced a very different effect upon Jacques from that which it produced upon Clemence. Jacques experienced an intense joy in being once more in the city he had thought at one time during his illness that he should never see again.

The bustle and animation of Paris captivated him. The intoxication of Parisian life had taken possession of him. He had left a delightful climate, he was fresh from scenes that enchanted the eye, yet the cloudy sky of Paris, the stone pavements of the streets had a charm for him he had not found in them, and he said to himself that there was nothing in the world more beautiful. He installed himself again joyfully in his bachelor apartments, and felt delightfully at home in them.

Clemence, established once more in her magnificent house in the Avenue Hoche, returned to the luxury and the cares of her former existence. In Monte Carlo she had lived like any bourgeoise. In Paris she was once more the celebrated actress, whose establishment cost three hundred thousand francs a year to support. She no longer seemed the same person to Jacques. A sudden transformation had taken place in her. Her appearance, her manner, her walk had entirely changed.

She spoke abruptly, her glance was imperious. Everything about her revealed the woman armed for the battle of life always on her guard, lest she should be taken at a disadvantage and conquered. She showed the liveliest tenderness for Jacques and repeatedly assured him of her affection, but the fact of her doing so showed already a diminution of his influence, which gave the young man food for thought. Clemence observed this feeling and tried to dissipate it. She grew gentle and caressing, and for a time was fond and amiable as before.

But the feeling of security in her affection which Jacques had entertained was at an end. In the little villa at Monte Carlo he might have cherished the illusion that she had never loved any one as she loved him. In her sumptuous house in Paris, everything spoke too plainly of her past for this to be the case. A feeling of disquietude took possession of him. He became sombre and irritable. He was no longer sure of her affection for him, and his love for her increased in consequence.

They had said they would never separate, and they saw less of each other than before. Not by the wish of Clemence, but her existence was no longer the same, and the exigencies of her establishment took up her time at the expense of her affection. Jacques acquired the habit of visiting her only at stated times, and gradually learned to set bounds to the expression of his passion for her. This was unfortunate. At Monte Carlo he would doubtless soon have wearied of her. But the obstacles his passion encountered in Paris inflamed it still further instead of weakening it.

Clemence, with the keenness of observation of a woman of the world, discerned at once the state of his feelings. She had learned long ago that security soon engenders indifference, and that the sharpest spur to love is uncertainty. Seeing Jacques thus uneasy and on the point of becoming a jealous lover, she took a malicious pleasure in holding him in suspense, letting him hope and fear by turns.

Taciturn when he was not with Clemence, Jacques caused his mother grave anxiety by the languor and apathy of his manner. He would spend hours stretched on the sofa in his smoking-room, his eyes fixed on the ceiling, smoking opium cigarettes, which dulled his brain, without moving, without uttering a word, and seemingly lost in this species of haschisch dream. His health still remained good, although the fresh color he had brought with him from the south had disappeared. He grew thin, but his nervous force sustained him in the life of pleasure he still continued to lead.

He went to his club every day at five, and later on in the evening when he was not with Clemence. He played heavily, and in the beginning had extraordinary luck. He won large sums at ecarte. He thought nothing of winning five hundred louis before dinner, and this money, so easily obtained, he squandered with superb indifference. It gave him pleasure to add to the luxuries that surrounded Clemence. He desired to heap princely gifts upon her instead of the roses and violets he had brought to her at Monte Carlo, and from this forth his life became a hell.

His gains at ecarte no longer sufficed to supply his wants, and baccarat seemed to offer him a wider field. Play, which had at first been an abstraction, then a means to obtain money, now became a passion. He loved it not only for the money with which it supplied him, but also for its excitement. He cut the cards with a sublime impassiveness that masked devouring anxiety. He would lose on a card 10,000 francs without a change in his countenance or a tremor in his voice. But he boiled inwardly, and the strain on his nerves was all the greater for the efforts he made to conceal it.

When, after a couple of hours of alternate successes and reverses, fortune finally took his side, the tension of his mind, excited by the desire to triumph, relaxed and he fell into a delicious state of beatitude. He experienced an instant of indescribable intoxication, during which he forgot everything that was not play.

Clemence was not long in discovering that she did not reign alone in the heart of Jacques, but she did not take umbrage at the presence there of this victorious rival, to whom she owed so large a share of her luxuries. Besides, a modification had taken place in her own sentiments. The feeling to which she had yielded herself completely in the solitude of the country was not strong enough to resist the distractions of Paris. She resumed her former mode of life. Seeing once more her friends and acquaintances, the daily round of pleasures in which she engaged left her less time than before to devote to Jacques.

And then Jacques himself, whose resistance to her power at first had added to the intensity of her passion for him, now, yielding to all her caprices, began to weary her. From the moment in which she saw that he was her slave he ceased to possess attractions for her. And in this the actress was no worse than the generality of women, and the blame for what must soon take place lay with Jacques. He had modified, of his own accord, the conditions of his intimacy with Clemence. He had ignored the fundamental axiom of the philosophy of love that the affection of a woman is in direct proportion to the sacrifices it exacts from her. Secure as she was in the possession of his love, his hold upon her affections had weakened. But because she no longer loved him was no reason that she should give him back his liberty. It was not in her nature to show such generosity. She had held Laurier in her toils a full year after she had ceased to care for him, and it was during this time that the artist, degraded, humiliated and tortured, had resolved to put an end to an existence which had become intolerable to him. Jacques as yet suspected nothing. Practised in the arts of deceit, Clemence charmed him as before by the grace of her smile, the sweetness of her words, the tenderness of her endearments.

He now scarcely ever went to visit his mother. The atmosphere of the house was too gloomy for him, and inspired him with no wish to return to it. His sister, although the malady which was sapping her life had developed no recognizable symptoms, drooped more and more every day—grew every day paler and more fragile. But by an effort of her will she succeeded in appearing cheerful, in order to keep up his mother's spirits. But Mme de Vignes was not deceived, and the two women, each trying to appear cheerful to the other, lived in secret anguish.

The doctors had decided that the malady of Juliette was anaemia. They found no organic trouble, either, of the heart or the lungs. They saw, however, that her strength visibly declined. It almost seemed as if Jacques had drawn from his sister all her vitality, and given her his own weakness in exchange. It was a matter of no slight astonishment to the physicians who had attended the brother the year before, to see him now leading the dissipated life he led, while Juliette, radiant in health last spring, had grown sickly and feeble. And Jacques, whom these two women had surrounded with so much care and tenderness, wearied by his mother's sadness, chilled by the sorrowful smile of his sister, made his visits rarer and rarer, throwing himself with desperate ardor into his old life.

The month of June had arrived, and Clemence wished, according to her custom, to instal herself at Deauville. Selim Nuno, for some years past, had placed his splendid villa every summer at the actress' disposal. Jacques, who viewed with displeasure the visits of the old financier to Clemence, opposed the project as soon as she mentioned it to him. To go to the sea-shore, good; to choose Deauville, very good, also. But to accept the hospitality of Nuno, what for? To this question Clemence responded without hesitation.

"For ten years past, my dear Jacques, Selim has been my true and constant friend. Men are changeable. You love me to-day; to-morrow you may forget me. The friends on whom one may depend under any circumstances are rare; their affection is not to be thrown away. And then, to speak frankly, Jacques, you cannot be jealous of this old man? He is like a father to me. And you know very well besides you have no reason to be afraid of anyone."

She tried to coax him out of his opposition, but the young man's objections were based on a solid foundation. He shook his head as he listened to her, without being convinced by her arguments.

"I should not like to be a visitor at M. Nuno's house," he said, "for although he will not reside in the villa, you will be none the less his guest. Let us go back to Monte Carlo, to the delightful solitude of the country, where you will be free to devote all your time to me. Here you are so taken up with your occupations and your friends, that I enjoy scarcely any of your society. There I should have you all to myself, and no one could take you away from me."

He spoke with passion, and Clemence listened to him with a curious sensation. His voice, formerly so sweet to her ears, now seemed commonplace and failed to awaken any emotion within her. His hands, which clasped hers, no longer sent a thrill through her. She saw in him only a fair, handsome young man, whose exactions began to weary her. To his importunities she responded with a smile which Jacques took as a presage of victory, and a proof of her affection. She, however, knew that the flame was extinguished and that nothing could relight it. Scarcely four months had passed and the sentiment with which he had inspired her was dead forever.

Her thoughts went back to the night of the veglione when they had first met. How vivid the emotion she had experienced then! And now how weary and indifferent she felt. He was still under the influence of his passion, but as for her, her infatuation for him was at an end.

While he clasped her hands she was saying to herself:

"No, no, it is over. He adores me and I am weary of him. Am I never to find a man who will refuse to acknowledge my power, or to whom I could prove constant?"

She rose from the sofa where she had been sitting beside Jacques, and leaning against the chimney-piece with a thoughtful air, said:

"Very well, then, be it as you wish. Any other house will do as well, provided only it be large, well situated, and have good stables for the horses, for I shall take all my establishment with me. But I must tell you beforehand that Nuno shall visit me there with as much freedom as anywhere else, for I have no intention of breaking off with my friends, nor of living in seclusion."

"And has such an idea ever occurred to me?" protested Jacques. "Have I not confidence in you?"

Clemence looked at him in silence for a moment, and a fugitive smile crossed her lips; then she said slowly:

"You are right to have confidence in me; if you mistrusted me it would not make the slightest difference!"

The evening was warm and fine. They went together to dine at the "Ambassadors." At eleven, Clemence, who was cross and complained of not feeling well, sent Jacques away. Irritated, he went to his club, and as a game at baccarat was going on, he took the bank and proceeded to deal the cards. Curious contradiction: fortunate at cards so long as he had been fortunate in love, the very hour in which Clemence discovered that she no longer loved him seemed to be the turning point in his luck also. Fortune suddenly withdrew her favor, and when he left the club he was a loser to the amount of three thousand louis.

He had won so much during the past few months that he attached but little importance to these reverses, which he looked upon as accidental. He was only all the more eager to have his revenge; but he lost more heavily than before. He could not believe that his ill-luck was going to continue, and he obstinately persisted in his efforts to retrieve his ill-fortune, but with ever worse results.

The house at Trouville was hired, and as Clemence was ready to leave Paris he determined at last to cut short this continued run of ill-luck, and they set out for the Norman coast.

There they continued the same life as at Paris, only seeing more of each other, which augmented the coldness of Clemence, forced as she was to make the effort to appear agreeable to a man who now wearied her. She revenged herself by employing her ingenuity in devising ways to make him spend money. At this time Jacques, his means of supply being cut off, was obliged to draw upon the fund he had in reserve. The difficulties of the situation seemed to excite him, and he now, when she was begining to tire of him.

The establishment of Clemence was maintained on a large scale and the excursions she was daily getting up were the talk of the place.

Parties, composed of the young people of Trouville, were constantly to be seen dashing along the Honfleur or Villers road. The house on such days was empty, and there was not a horse to be had in the whole place. The women of the party went in carriages, and they all stopped to breakfast at one of the pretty and excellent inns on the road. Amid clouds of dust raised by the horses' feet, and under the brilliant sunshine, the cavaliers dismounting helped the women to descend from the coaches, in the midst of joyful cries and bursts of laughter, the villagers standing motionless in their doorways in open-mouthed wonder at the vision of gay costumes and little feet that flew rapidly past.

At other times they would take the steam yacht of Baron Tresorier and sail along a placid sea to Fecamp or Cherbourg. In the evening all the gay party would assemble in the Casino of Trouville and dance till midnight. Then they would return home, weary of the pleasures of the day, and an hour later, the men of the party would meet again at the club and spend the rest of the night, till day dawned, at cards. Jacques, with stern, but impassive countenance, played with persistent ill-luck, and saw the last remnant of his little fortune disappearing by degrees. He was not discouraged, however, and with incomprehensible faith in his luck awaited its return. Fortune, he said to himself, could not always prove faithless to him, and a few nights' winnings would retrieve his losses. A method of reasoning common with all gamblers; a confidence common to all losers, which is seldom justified by the event.

One evening when he had been playing with his habitual ill-luck, the bank being put open for bids, he heard a voice which he recognized utter the sacred words: "The bank is open for play." He raised his eyes, and, separated from him only by the length of the table, he saw Patrizzi before him. His glance encountered that of the Prince, who gave him a friendly smile. At the same moment a man who had been standing behind the Neapolitan emerged from the group, and Jacques, with a horrible tightening of the heart, recognized Dr. Davidoff.

The young man stood rooted to the spot. A cold perspiration broke out on his forehead, and he heard a buzzing sound in his ears. It seemed to him as if the ghastly image of death had risen up before him. He was still motionless, without the power to advance or retreat, fascinated by the mocking glance of the Russian, when Patrizzi coming behind him laid his hand upon his shoulder. Jacques turned round with an effort, and with a haggard look gave his attention to the Prince, who was speaking to him. He hardly understood what the Neapolitan was saying, but the thought that he was being observed, and that his manner must awaken surprise, restored to him his strength in a measure; he passed his hand over his forehead and made the effort to say to Patrizzi:

"Have you been here long?"

"About a quarter of an hour," the Prince answered. "Davidoff and I came in just as your bank was being vigorously attacked. Those Englishmen have made some rude assaults upon you, my dear friend."

"I am not very lucky just now," stammered Jacques.

"That is what those gentlemen were just saying. But excuse me, they are waiting for me to deal. I am going to try to avenge you. Stay, here is Davidoff."

DANDRUFF ON HEAD IN DRY CRUST

Hair Came Out. Scalp Itched and Burned. Scales Like Sawdust. Cuticura Healed In Six Weeks.

The Pas, Manitoba.—"Four years ago I began to lose my hair. It used to come out any time that I combed it. I think it was because my head was full of dandruff. Whenever I brushed it the scales flew off like sawdust. My scalp also itched and burned and my head was like a dry crust. The dandruff showed very plainly.

"I applied several remedies but found no improvement till I used Cuticura Soap and Ointment. After using Cuticura Soap and Ointment a few days I found a great difference so I continued with them six weeks and they completely healed me." (Signed) L. D. Lockwood, June 4, 1914.

Unique Flood Mark.

A striking warning against the floods that rise with inconceivable rapidity and volume in Rocky Mountain streams is seen in a gorge twenty-five miles west of Denver. Here Bear creek, a mere rivulet, hardly ankle deep, threads it way for several miles through a narrow canyon, in places hardly wide enough to permit a roadway beside the stream. At one of these narrow points a needle of granite thrusts itself up between creek and roadway to a point of more than forty feet. Poised upon its top like the bar on the letter T, is a huge log, twenty feet long. It was left there some years ago by a sudden flood that drowned more than a score of people camping in the canyon. On a brass tablet fastened to the pillar the county authorities have inscribed this pregnant sentence, "If you knew what put this log up here you wouldn't camp in this canyon."—New York Times.

Words Not Adequate.

Human emotions may be portrayed with words. Anger and every emotion are comon qualities, generally understood. But the external spectacle, the Zambezi that leaps over a 400 foot precipice, the active volcano, the geyser that hurls boiling water into the heavens, the hurricane, the battle, flood, earthquake, conflagration—these elemental things cannot be portrayed by the finest artifice. They must be seen, heard, realized through an impact of the senses before they gain full meaning.—Exchange.

Walking ought to be encouraged, not only as a healthy exercise, but as a means of seeing the country and getting acquainted with the people. The modern inventions for swift travel are good in their way, but they cannot take the place of walking, which combines exercise with leisurely observation.

A WOMAN'S MESSAGE TO WOMEN

If you are troubled with weak, tired feelings, headache, backache, bearing down sensations, bladder weakness, constipation, catarrhal conditions, pain in the sides regularly or irregularly, bloating or unnatural enlargements, sense of falling or misplacement of internal organs, nervousness, desire to cry, palpitation, hot flashes, dark rings under the eyes, or a loss of interest in life, I invite you to write and ask for my simple method of home treatment with ten days' trial entirely free and postpaid, also references to Canadian ladies who gladly tell how they have regained health, strength, and happiness by this method. Write to-day. Address: Mrs. M. Summers, Box 8, Windsor, Ont.

Household Helps.

If kerosene and water be put into a sprinkling pot, and all outhouses, dustpans, etc., places where flies breed and increase in thousands, be sprinkled carefully with the mixture occasionally during the summer months, the eggs will be destroyed, and the household be spared an intolerable nuisance of real danger.

A good way to use up coal dust is to save all paper bags, fill them with the dust, and when the fire requires mending place a bag of dust on it, with a few pieces of coal on top. This plan is much cleaner than putting on the dust in shovelfuls, as it cakes, and so does not tumble through the bars of the grate onto the hearth.

NEW RED BUG

Has Made Appearance in New York State Orchards.

A new orchard pest, which specializes on peach and cherry leaves, has been found in the vcinity of Brant Angola by Supt. W. L. Markham, of the Erie County Farm Bureau, New Yok State. It is a small red bug, with a hard shell and wings similar to the lady bug.

The bug works on the underside of leaves, thereby escaping casual notice. Large numbers have been found around the trunks of trees and some of the limbs. It does not resemble in habits the old red bug which has attacked apple trees.

The insect also has been found in Chatauqua County. Advice from the Geneva's agricultural experiment station is to spray the trees, using three pounds of arsenic to fifty gallons of water.

Delicate Young Girls, Pale, Tired Women

There is no beauty in pallor, but proof of plenty of weakness. Exertion makes your heart flutter your back and limbs ache, and you sadly need something to put some ginger into your system. CHURCH UNION IN CANADA.

(Ottawa Journal.)

The overwhelming vote in favor of Church Union yesterday in the Presbyterian General Assembly at Kingston is is significant of the time in which we live. The period covered by the last two or three generations with its unprecedented changes in almost every department of human life has not left the narrow spirit of sectarianism unhurt. To-day the world realizes more than ever before the need of unity, and above all of the unity of the Christian Churches. World upheavals, the co-mingling of the blood of all sects and creeds in the common cause of justice and humanity should give us thought, should make us realize the smallness of the differences that have impeded our progress along the path of spiritual enlightenment in the past. We are still within the circle of transitional change, and the organization of the churches into one body may be some distance in the future, but we may and should strive more earnestly towards the goal. In the meantime it behooves us all, and especially those of us who may have been brought up and trained in highly dogmatic faiths resting on creeds formulated long ago, to judge our neighbors with patience, humility and charity, bearing in mind that, however deep-rooted our own convictions and creeds may be, we can only claim to see, like St. Paul, through a glass darkly, and that the earnest seeker after truth along other paths is as sincere and honest as ourselves.

WHEN BABY IS ILL

When he is troubled with constipation, indigestion, vomiting or worms give him Baby's Own Tablets. They sweeten the stomach, regulate the bowels and cure all these troubles simply because they banish the cause. Concerning them, Mrs. Phillias Duval, St. Leonard, Que., writes: "We are well satisfied with Baby's Own Tablets, which we have used for our baby when suffering from constipation and vomiting." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Tale of Two Dogs.

Sir John Sebright, a prominent society man of the early nineteenth century, owned a remarkable dog. In "Coke of Norfolk" Mrs. A. M. W. Stirling relates that "Sir John Sebright often brought a favorite dog to Holkham, who was remarkably clever at learning tricks. Lord Erskine also possessed a dog which he declared the cleverer of the two. A wager was laid as to which animal in the course of a twelvemonth could be taught the most extraordinary trick. The trial took place at Holkham at the end of a year. Erskine's dog cleverly took a roast oyster out of the fire without injuring himself, but Sir John's dog actually carried a glass of wine without spilling a drop to any gentleman in the room pointed out to him."

STAY OUTDOORS.

(London Advertiser.)

With the coming of the warm summer months, why not inaugurate a "stay-outdoors" movement? Spend every spare minute outside, and arrange the odd jobs so they can be done on the back steps. Turn the veranda into the living-room, serving the meals there if convenient. Sleep outside, live outside. Let the whole family absorb unlimited oxygen.

Ask for Minard's and take no other.

The Refrigerator.

Should be washed with water in which washing soda and borax is dissolved twice a week in cold weather every other day in warm.

When clean, pieces of charcoal should be laid in the corners to absorb the odors and keep the place sweet. Charcoal should be renewed often.

A "close" smell in the refrigerator may be destroyed by ground coffee held therein on a shovel or pan nearly red hot. It should be kept there a few minutes.

Butter and milk should not be kept in the same compartment with strong-smelling articles.

INVESTMENT OPPORTUNITY

Wanted capital to develop one of the most valuable natural resources in the Dominion, unlimited quantity of raw material to be manufactured into a commodity for which there is an almost unlimited demand. If you have one hundred to five hundred dollars or more to invest where your investment will be well secured, then write for particulars and prospectus which will convince you of the absolutely sure and large returns. TREATMENT OF IMMIGRANTS.

(Toronto Star.)

The British Empire has for long had its wide doors open to Europeans of all races and religions. They have been made welcome. They have been invited to join with us under our free institutions in promoting the progress of humanity. They have come from every country, and they and their sons and daughters, and their grandchildren and great grand-children, are among us in Canada. Let us show them that our free institutions are not shaken even by this great war, and that men who are British subjects have but to act as such and they will be treated as such.

Dreams.

To-night the fingers of the rain
Beat softly on the window pane
And lo! my heart is back again
Within the golden years;
Again I hear the thrushes' call
I see the roses on the wall,
The sunlight sparkles over all
Seen through a mist of tears.

And in the garden's summer glow
Two little figures come and go,
The one with the brow and throat of snow,
Her eyes were heaven' sown blue;
Her cheeks were like the roses there,
As threads of gold her flowing hair
She was indeed a flour most fair,
Like those of sun and dew.

Ah me! Within the churchyard's shade
That lovely fair form is laid,
The merry child with whom I played,
Amid the birds and flours;
And, listening to the autumn rain,
With its deep undertone of pain,
My thoughts go back to her again,
And all the golden hours.

The years, though sad, are quickly flown
Her name now carven on a stone,
With moss and ivy overgrown,
Still sacred is to me;
And oh, to-night my heart would fain
Forget the burden of its pain,
Go back to her and youth again,
When life was glad and free.

SUMMER SKIN TROUBLES.

Sunburn, blistering, and irritation are the commonest form of summer skin troubles, and Zam-Buk ends these very quickly. It works in two ways. As soon as applied, its antiseptic powers get to work and kill all the poison in a wound, a sting or a sore. This generally ends the smarting and the pain. Then Zam-Buk begins the healing process, and fresh healthy tissue is built up. For sore, blistered feet, sore hands, heat rashes, baby's heat spots, sore places due to perspiration, etc., you can't equal Zam-Buk. It also cures cuts, ulcers, abscesses, piles, and all inflamed and diseased conditions of skin and subjacent tissue. Druggists and stores everywhere sell Zam-Buk, 50c. box. Use Zam-Buk Soap also, 25c. per tablet. All stores, or Zam-Buk Co. Toronto.

Editor Gets His.

George Ade, in the early days of his career, before he had achieved fame, called one morning upon a Sunday on a mission from a theatrical manager, says the Green Book Magazine.

"I have brought you this manuscript—" began Mr. Ade but the editor, glancing up and seeing the tall, timid youth, interrupted:

"I see. Well, just throw the manuscript in the waste paper basket. I'm very busy just now and haven't time to do it myself."

Mr. Ade obeyed calmly. Then he began again:

"I have just come from the theatre, and the manuscript I have thrown in the waste basket is your drama, which the manager asked me to return to you, with thanks. He suggested that the proper place for it was with the waste paper."

Then Mr. Ade smiled a wee smile and withdrew.

This is to certify that fourteen years ago I got the cords of my left wrist nearly severed, and was for about nine months that I had no use of my hand, and tried other liniments, also doctors, and was receiving no benefit. By a persuasion from a friend, I got MINARD'S LINIMENT, and used one bottle which completely cured me, and have been using MINARD'S LINIMENT in my family ever since, and find it the same as when I first used it, and would never be without it.

THE QUIET VILLAGE.

(Franklin, Ind., Star.)

Much fun is made of the town where the train going through is the principal event of the day. But it is in these quiet villages that the soul of man blooms. The people there have time to know each other. They take time to encourage community happiness and contentment. It is in the big city that people become submerged in the great stream of metallized life that drowns out the heart spirit of man with a determined indifference in its rapid race to reach thee great gulf of gold—that gulf which is so eternally fixed between man's spiritual and material possessions. True happiness is of the spirit. It cannot be bought with gold—not with even a gulf of gold. "Where thy treasure is, there will thy heart be also," said the Master. The treasure of the quiet village will not be mocked.

Land Leeches of Ceylon.

Beautiful Ceylon has mosquitoes said to be the most adroit and audacious in the world and snakes and a thousand more plagues of poor human beings but the worst of them all is a species of leech. The Ceylon land leech is a thin creature about two inches long and very nimble and flexible. It will crawl up a man's leg and, travelling underneath the clothing, will climb as high as the throat. These leeches do not crawl like the leeches that are known to medicine, but rear themselves up on their tails to watch for prey and walk off to attack it with amazing rapidity. In walking through the jungle hosts of them may be seen by the roadside, where they wait to victimize cattle. Horses, it is said, are driven half wild by them, as also are palanquin bearers and coolies, whose bare legs are their favorite resort, the men's hands being too engaged to pull them off. The leeches may be seen hanging round their ankles, from which tiny trickles of blood run over the foot.—London Standard.

THE STEEL PASSENGER CAR

When the steel passenger car was introduced into American railway systems, the immediate object was to diminish loss of life in collisions. The replacement of equipment, will have cost the railways approximately $650,000,000 and incidentally has considerably increased the cost of operation, as heavier locomotives are required to haul the trains. The President of the Chicago & Great Western Railway says:

"These heavier locomotives, with heavy steel equipment behind them, running at high speed, in case of accident become more destructive than any of the trains in the days of the wooden car; in fact, we have records of the complete destruction of steel sleeping cars in rear-end collisions, and it would be impossible to build a steel car that would resist the shock of a rear-end collision from a train running fifty or sixty miles an hour."

The substitution of steel for wooden cars has also dealt a serious blow to the lumber industries of the Pacific Northwest and has increased the danger of forest fires. Car material provides a market for the common grades of lumber and the elimination of this market has meant a large proportion of waste left in the woods. Waste left in the woods means increased forest fires hazard, and greater difficulty in clearing land for agricultural development, so that in the opinion of the Pacific Coast lumberman the cost to Uncle Sam has been much more than $650,000,000—indeed, it would be more like a billion dollars—all of which has ultimately to be paid by the public.

Kitchen Kinks.

Popovers should have a hot oven for first ten minutes, then slow for thirty minutes.

Much heavy cake is the result of the oven door not being closed as gently as possible.

Ink Spots on Polished Wood.—Paint lightly with sweet spirits of niter. Polish with cloth dipped in sweet oil.

Stains on Tiled Hearths.—Rub with sand and paraffin, not soap.

A bag of salt standing where there is a smell of fish will absorb the aroma.

When washing china with gilt upon it never use soda. Rub a little soap on the dishcloth to make a nice lather, then rinse in clear cold water.

A good plan is to keep buttons in glass bottles. A glance tells you exactly what is inside, thus saving a good deal of time which would be taken up in turning over the buttons if put in a box.

MR. BAUMGARTEN AND MR. DONNER RETIRE

Mr. J. W. McConnell, of the St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Company, announces the following changes in the management of the company. The retirement of Mr. Alfred Baumgarten as honorary president and as a director of the company. He also announced this afternoon that Mr. Baumgarten had disposed of his entire interests in the company. Mr. O. W. Donner, who has been Managing Director for the past three years, has also resigned his position, and Mr. J. W. McConnell has been elected to the position of managing director, which he will held along with the position of president of the company.

Mr. Baumgarten some time ago asked for permission to absent himself from the meetings of the Board of the Bank of Montreal, of which he was a director.

IS BRITAIN IN PERIL?

Sir William Robertson Nicoll, editor of the British Weekly, is perhaps one of the sanest men in Great Britain. In the journalistic world he is honored and respected. He is a man of wide knowledge and deep understanding and would not in any way do or say anything for the sake of notoriety. Consequently anything that he might say in relation to the war deserves every consideration. This week he makes a stirring appeal and gives a solemn warning to the people of Great Britain. He tells them that at the beginning of the war Germany had the advantage in superiority of numbers of men. Now, he says, she has a superiority in the quantity of munitions of war, and that she will press this superiority to the farthest limit. The next three months will be critical ones for Great Britain, he believes. Should the Russians be compelled to give way in the East, a million men of the enemy will be released for service in the West, and no moral barrier will prevent Germany from the most cruel and reckless employment of any weapon. Anything that the devil can invent will be taken advantage of. Gas and burning liquids and every other devilish device the Germans will use.

Mr. Nicoll declares that the Kaiser has not yet given up hope of reaching Paris, Warsaw and Calais, and he believes that it is almost certain that he will attempt an invasion of Great Britain. In view of all this Mr. Nicoll declares that it is imperative that the whole nation rally at once, to-morrow may be too late. Every effort must be put forth to supply Lloyd-George with all the munitions that he needs, and Mr. Nicoll, who is a close friend of the Minister of Munitions, intimates that, if he be hampered by the House of Commons or any other opposition, he will resign his position in the Government and refuse to go on. Evidently the protests of Philip Snowden and other Labor members against the Prussianizing of the workingmen have annoyed Mr. Lloyd-George. He says that it is necessary for the men in the factories as for those at the front to give up everything for the sake of home and country and beating the enemy. Mr. Nicoll goes further and says that if the bickering continues there may be another election. Such an election would either result in national disaster or in the reign of a dictator. We look for neither. We believe that Lloyd-George will soon get all the shells and high explosives that he will require or ask for.

BRITAIN'S SHARE IN THE WAR.

Britain, despite the almost despairing exhortations of her leaders, seems unable to rise to the occasion and to-day is largely on the defensive, even on the seas. She is making no advances, except as there are successes at the Dardanelles. * * * France's achievements have been marvelous, almost as marvelous as those of Germany, when we consider her reputation for decadence before the war, and the circumstance that little was expected of her. The French lines alone have been steady; they alone have been wholly impenetrable to the German assaults. Of course, there was a retreat at the outset, but this was before the resources of the nation could be brought into the field.—Detroit Free Press.

The Rochester Herald, the Detroit Free Press and several other U. S. newspapers seem to take especial pleasure in belittling the work of Great Britain in the present war. Why, it is hard to say. When the war broke out, neither Russia nor France expected Britain to do more on land than send her expeditionary force to the front. Certainly Britain expected that that was all that would be required of her. But events soon showed that if Belgium and France were to be saved much more would have to be done. Perhaps it is not too much to say that if British troops had not been in France at the retreat from Mons the Germans would long since have been in Paris. It was only the other week that the Canadians "saved the situation" when the French lines were broken. Not only is Britain [illegible] battering her way through the Dardanelles but she is waging war against the enemy in Africa, Mesopotamia and other "points" [illegible] Germany [illegible] known as a [illegible].

The Toronto Star states that a manufacturer called at [illegible] many other manufacturers were willing to make shells, but could get no assurance of contracts from the Shell Committee at Ottawa. Is the patronage list still doing duty?

EDITORIAL NOTES

With a coalition Government there is likely a coalition Opposition.

There need be little unemployment in Canada when 25,000 recruits are wanted.

The Manitoban who was [illegible] 10,000 intended for Mr. Salt, sure enough got salted.

"Excelsior" should be the cry of the Italian troops as they scale height after height.

Rev. Dr. Herridge says that men can fight better with good hymns. How about a hymn of hate?

The Northwestern University of Chicago has conferred the degree of Doctor of Laws upon Mr. N. W. Rowell, K. C. The honor was deserved.

It may not be etiquette to hang kings or emperors, but the Crown Prince of Bavaria will get the halter if he ever falls into the hands of the British.

All kinds of ships look alike to the German submarine. In the starvation decree a neutral ship which carries food to Britain are as objectionable to them as are British ships.

Canada has orders for [illegible] shells. She has 217 factories making them, 60,000 men employed, and 78 cities and towns in the business. This should help to help out Gen. French.

It should not be forgotten that Britain has more than one theater of war. Besides the fighting in Flanders, she has other campaigns at the Dardanelles, the head of the Persian Gulf, the Suez Canal, German East Africa, German Southwest Africa and in the Cameroons. Besides this she is helping to finance the allies.

At a Congregational Union meeting in Ottawa the other evening Rev. Dr. R. F. Welsh, head of the Montreal Presbyterian College, declared that every war tax stamp is a lie cut into the national credit and good name of the country. The money thus being raised is not being spent on the war at all, but is being used to pay interest on the debts incurred before the war. The money spent for war purposes is being borrowed from Great Britain.

If devotion to party had not been stronger than devotion to the Empire [illegible] Canadian Dreadnoughts would now be [illegible] elsewhere, would have [illegible] additional British vessels to be released for that [illegible] enterprise.—Toronto News.

Had it not been for the Tory party Canada would have had a navy of its own to protect its own shores, its own soldiers and the trade routes. The gift of a dreadnought by New Zealand to Britain did not add an additional ship to the fleet. It merely took the place of another ship.

The Scientific American celebrated its seventieth anniversary by publishing a June number of almost 600 pages, finely illustrated, and dealing with many phases of the advance of [illegible]. Editorially it says:

What a record of scientific activity we have lived through! And yet all that we have witnessed is but a mere episode in the evolution that still lies before us. What discoveries and inventions we have still to see at [illegible]! When we think that at the time the Scientific American was started it took [illegible] weeks to send a message from New York to Liverpool and three months to Calcutta, when we think that only yesterday we marveled at the application of ether and chloroform to surgery, at the [illegible] of telegraphing across the ocean without wires, at the [illegible] of the Panama Canal, at the opportunity of viewing the skeleton beneath the living flesh with the X-rays, and the [illegible] of a man flying in the air swifter than a bird; when we think that it has been our privilege not merely to see these and many other miracles and to [illegible] Yet if we remember ourselves with those who will record the achievements of science a century hence, to this day may seem [illegible] when the moon and the stars were [illegible]

Had A Lame Back

FOR A LONG TIME.

Sometimes Could Hardly Turn In Bed.

When the back aches and pains like a "toothache" you may rest assured that the kidneys are affected in some way.

On the first sign of a backache, Doan's Kidney Pills should be taken, and if this is done immediately you will save yourself many years of suffering from serious kidney trouble.

Mr. J. W. [illegible], Truro, N.S., writes: "I have had a lame back for a long time. Sometimes I could hardly turn over in bed, but after using [illegible] boxes of Doan's Kidney Pills I find that my back is as strong as ever. I can't praise them enough."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c. per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont. When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

THE Changeling

"Certing, certing," answered the woman, curtseying almost to the floor. "Walk right in, if you can git in. It's my cheese day, or I should have been cleared away sooner. Here, Betsy Jane! you have prinked long enough; come and hist the winders in t'other room, and wing 'em off, so the ladies can set in there out of this dirty place"; then, turning to Madam Conway, who was industriously freeing her French kids from the sand they had accumulated during her walk, she continued: "Have some of my slippers to rest your feet a spell," and, diving into a press or closet, she brought forth a pair of slippers large enough to hold both of Madam Conway's feet at once.

With a mighty frown the lady declined the offer, while Maggie looked on in delight, pleased with an adventure which promised so much fun. After a moment Betsy Jane appeared, attired in a dress similar to that of her mother, for whose look appearance she made ample amends in the wonderful expansion of her robes, which, minus either tuck or fold at the bottom, set out like a miniature tent, upsetting at once the band-box which Madam Conway had placed upon a chair, and which, with its contents, rolled promiscuously over the floor.

"Betsy Jane! How can you wear them abominable things!" exclaimed the distressed woman, stooping to pick up the purple satin which had tumbled out.

A look from the more fashionable daughter, as with a swinging sweep she passed on into the parlor, silenced the mother on the subject of hoops, and thinking her guests must necessarily be thirsty after their walk, she brought them a pitcher of water, asking if they'd choose it clear or with a little ginger and molasses, at the same time calling to Betsy Jane to know if them winders was histed yet!

The answer was in the affirmative, whereupon the ladies were invited to enter, which they did the more willingly, as through the open door they had caught glimpses of what proved to be a very handsome Brussels carpet, which in that room seemed a little out of place, as did the sofa and handsome hair-cloth rocking-chair. In this last Madam Conway seated herself, while Maggie reclined upon a lounge, wondering at the difference in the various articles of furniture, some of which were quite expensive, while others were of the most common kind.

"Wonder how they [illegible] looks like [illegible]," said Maggie, as [illegible] left the room. "I mean to ask them [illegible]." But this her grandmother would not suffer. "It was too much like familiarity," she said, and the old lady did not believe in putting herself on a level with such people.

Another loud blast from the horn was blown, for the bustling woman of the house was evidently getting anxious, and ere long three or four men appeared, washing themselves from the [illegible] and wiping upon a coarse towel which hung upon a roller near the back door.

"I never eat at the same table with those creatures," said Madam Conway, feeling intuitively that she would be invited to dinner.

"Why, grandma, yes you will, if she asks you to," answered Maggie. "Only think how kind they are to us perfect strangers!"

What else she might have said was prevented by the entrance of Betsy Jane, who informed them that "dinner was ready," and, with a mental groan, as she thought how she was about to be martyred, Madam Conway followed her to the dining-room, where a substantial farmer's meal was spread. Standing at the head of the table, with her red [illegible] face all in a glow, was the hostess, who, pointing Madam to a chair, said: "Now set right by, and make yourselves to hum. [illegible] the table over, and I guess I should if I had anything fit for [illegible] 'biled victuals'!" and taking it for granted they were, she loaded both Madam Conway's and Maggie's plate with every variety of vegetables used in the preparation of the dish known everywhere as "boiled victuals."

By this time the men had ranged themselves in respectful silence down the opposite side of the table, each stealing an admiring though modest glance at Maggie, for the masculine heart, whether it beat beneath a home-spun frock or coat of finest cloth, is alike susceptible to showing youthful beauty like that of Maggie Miller. The head of the house [illegible] "had gone to town with a load of wood," so his spouse informed the ladies, at the same time pouring out a cup of tea, which she said she had tried to make strong enough to bear up an egg. "Betsy Jane," she continued, [illegible] with a deprecating glance first at the blue sugar-bowl and then at her daughter, "what possessed you to put on this brown sugar, when I told you to [illegible]

[illegible]

"Certainly," answered Maggie, anxious to see how the rations would manage to squeeze in between herself and the table-leg, as they would have to do if they came an inch nearer.

This feat could not be done, and in attempting it Betsy Jane upset Maggie's tea upon her handsome traveling dress, eliciting from her mother the exclamation, "Betsy Jane Douglas, you allus was the blunderin'est girl!"

This little accident diverted the woman's mind from Mike, while Madam Conway, starting at the name of Douglas, thought to herself, "Douglas! Douglas! I did not suppose 'twas so common a name. But, then, it don't hurt George any, having these creatures bear his name."

Dinner being over, Madam Conway and Maggie returned to the parlor, where, while the former resumed her chair, the latter amused herself by examining the books and odd-looking daguerreotypes which lay upon the table.

"Oh, grandmother," she almost screamed, bounding to that lady's side, "as I live, here's a picture of Theo and George Douglas taken together," and she held up a handsome casing before the astonished old lady, who, donning her golden spectacles in a twinkling, saw for herself that what Maggie said was true.

"They stole it!" she gasped. "We are in a den of thieves! Who knows what they'll take from my bandbox?" and she was about to leave the room, when Maggie, whose quick mind saw farther ahead, bade her stop.

"I may discover something more," said she, and taking a handsomely bound volume of Lamb, she turned to the fly-leaf and read: "Jenny Douglas, from her brother George, Worcester, January 8th."

It was plain to her now; but any mortification she might otherwise have experienced was lost in the one absorbing thought, "What will grandma say?"

"Grandmother," said she, closing the book, "don't you remember the mother of that girl called her Betsy Jane Douglas?"

"Yes, yes," [illegible] Madam Conway, [illegible]

"And don't you know [illegible]

"Maggie, Maggie," hoarsely whispered Madam Conway, [illegible] Maggie's arm, "do you mean to insinuate—am I to understand that that [illegible] woman and [illegible] are to be the mother and sister of George Douglas?"

"I haven't a doubt of it," answered Maggie. "The resemblance between Betsy Jane and George [illegible] I observed at first."

Out of her chair on the floor tumbled Madam Conway, fainting outright away, while Maggie, stepping to the door, called for help.

"I mistrusted she was awful sick at dinner," said Mrs. Douglas, taking her hands from the dishwater, and running to the parlor. "I wish I had some of the camphor [illegible] Does she have these spells often?"

By this time Betsy Jane had brought a basin of water, which she dashed in the face of the unconscious woman, who soon began to revive.

"Pennyroyal tea'd settle her stomach quicker'n anything else," said Mrs. Douglas. "I'll steep a little right off," and, helping Madam Conway on the sofa, she left the room.

"There may possibly be a mistake after all," thought Maggie. "I'll question the girl," and, turning to Betsy Jane, she said, taking up the book which had before attracted her attention, "Is this Jenny Douglas intended for you?"

"Yes, ma'am," answered the girl, coloring slightly. "Brother George calls me Jenny, because he thinks Betsy so old-fashioned."

An audible groan from the sofa, and Maggie continued, "Where does your brother live?"

"In Worcester, ma'am. [illegible]

[illegible]

"Is he married?" asked Maggie, and Mrs. Douglas, [illegible]

[illegible]

"I've looked at it before," said Maggie, and the good woman [illegible]

[illegible] "and I shan't lay it up against her. I shall see her to-morrow, pretty likely, for Sam Babbit's wife and I are goin' down to the firemen's muster. You've heard on't, I s'pose. The different engines are goin' to see which will shute water the highest over a 150-foot pole. I couldn't miss goin' for anything, and of course I shall call on Theodosy. I calkilate to like her, and when they go to housekeepin' I've got a hull chest full of sheets, and pillerbiers, and towels I'm goin' to give her, besides three or four bed quilts I pieced myself, two in herrin'-cone pattern and one in risin' sun. I'll show 'em to you," and leaving the room, she soon returned with three patchwork quilts, wherein were all possible shades of color, red and yellow predominating, and in one the "rising sun" forming a huge centre piece.

"Heavens!" fairly articulated Madam Conway, pressing her hands upon her head, which was supposed to be aching dreadfully. The thought of Theo reposing beneath the "risin' sun," or yet the "herrin'-bone," was intolerable, and, looking beseechingly at Maggie, she whispered, "do see if Mike is ready."

"If it's the carriage, you mean," chimed in Mrs. Douglas, "it's been waiting quite a spell, but I thought you warn't fit to ride yet, so I didn't tell you."

Starting to her feet, Madam Conway's bonnet went on in a trice, and taking her shawl in her hand she walked out doors, barely expressing her thanks to Mrs. Douglas, who, greatly distressed at her abrupt departure, ran for the herb tea, and taking the tin cup in her hand, followed her guest to the carriage, urging her to "take a swaller just to keep from vomiting."

"She's better without it," said Maggie. "She seldom takes medicine," and politely expressing her gratitude to Mrs. Douglas for her kindness, she bade Mike drive on.

"Some crazy critter just out of the asylum, I'll bet," said Mrs. Douglas, walking back to the house with her pennyroyal tea. "How queer she acted; but that girl's a lady, every inch of her, and so handsome, too; I wonder who she is?"

"Don't [illegible] the old woman [illegible] a little above us?" suggested Betsy Jane, who had more discernment than her mother.

"Like enough she did, though I never thought on't. But she needn't. I'm as good as she is, and I'll warrant as much thought on, where I'm known," and, quite satisfied with her own position, Mrs. Douglas went back to her dish-washing, while Betsy Jane stole away upstairs to try the experiment of arranging her hair after the fashion in which Margaret wore hers.

In the meantime, Mike, perfectly [illegible], had turned his horses' heads in the direction of Hillsdale, when Madam Conway called out, "to Worcester, Mike—to Worcester, as fast as you can drive."

"To Worcester! For what?" asked Maggie, and the excited woman answered, "To stop it. [illegible]"

"To stop it," repeated Maggie. "I'd like to see you stop it, when they've been married two months!"

"So they have, so they have!" said Madam Conway, wringing her hands in her despair, and crying out "that a Conway should be so disgraced! What shall I do? What shall I do?"

"Make the best of it, of course," answered Maggie. "I don't [illegible] for his parentage. He is evidently greatly respected in Worcester, where his family are undoubtedly known. He is highly educated and refined. If Theo [illegible] loves him, and that is sufficient, unless I add that he has money."

"But not as much as I supposed," groaned Madam Conway. [illegible] "Give me the hartshorn, Maggie. I [illegible]!"

The hartshorn was handed her, but it could not allay her distress. Her family pride was sorely wounded and [illegible]

[illegible] she exclaimed, after Maggie had exhausted all her powers of persuasion in vain. Then, as she remembered the woman's avowed intention of visiting her daughter-in-law on the morrow, she felt that she must turn back, she must see Theo and [illegible] of that vulgar creature claiming her for a daughter, might be of incalculable injury.

"Stop, Mike," she was about to say, but ere the words passed her lips she reflected that to take Maggie back to Worcester was to throw her again in Henry Warner's way, and this she could not do. There was then but one alternative. She could stop at the Charlton depot, not far distant, and wait for the downward train, while Mike took Maggie home, and this she resolved to do. Mike was [illegible] bidden to take her at once to the depot, which he did, while she explained to Maggie her reason for returning.

"Theo is much better alone, and George will not thank you for interfering," said Maggie, not at all pleased with her grandmother's proceedings. But the old lady was determined. [illegible]

"When will you come home?" asked Maggie.

[illegible] to-morrow night. [illegible]," said Madam Conway, referring to the expected visit of Mrs. Douglas, senior.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson XIII. June 27, 1915.

David, the Shepherd of Israel—Review.—Psalm 78: 65-72.

Summary.—Lesson I. Topic: The first Easter day. Place: Jerusalem. Jesus rose from the dead on the third day after his crucifixion. The women sought his body in the tomb to embalm it, but did not find it. They were informed by the angel at the tomb that Christ had risen. They went to tell the disciples and met Jesus. He made an appointment to meet them in Galilee. The women were disappointed at first, but later were filled with great joy because of the assurance that their Lord was alive.

II. Topic: Divine [illegible]. Places: Ramah; Bethlehem. The Lord sent Samuel, as prophet, to Bethlehem to anoint one of Jesse's sons king of Israel in the place of Saul. David, the youngest son, was anointed, being called in from the field, where he was caring for his father's flocks. He was later called to Saul's court to play on the harp to quiet him, for he was troubled with an evil spirit. Saul was [illegible] giving David entrance into the court where later he would be in complete control. David's [illegible], bravery, devotion and ability impressed Saul favorably.

III. Topic: Divine fellowship. [illegible]. As David was a shepherd, it was natural for him to [illegible] the life of the godly under the figure of a sheep in relation to the shepherd. The great shepherd, the Father, Jehovah, provides for his sheep, his people; he protects them, he guides them, he comforts them. This psalm presents a true and striking picture of Oriental life. Amid surroundings of dire dangers abroad the shepherd guards and protects his sheep. He does more than that, for he leads them to places where they have an abundance of food and where they find water. And besides safety and [illegible] they have true rest. This illustrates God's care for his children.

IV. Topic: Faith demonstrated. Place: The battle was fought in the valley of Elah. The army of the Israelites and of the Philistines were arrayed against each other. Goliath, of the Philistine army, defied any warrior of Israel for forty days. At last David answered and offered to meet him in battle. He was permitted to do so, and he [illegible] Goliath [illegible] with his sling and stones. Eliab, an older brother of David's, was not pleased to see David come to the camp and make himself prominent, and he would have sent him away if he could [illegible]. The Lord had a place for David, however, and a work for him to do.

V. Topic: Attempted violence. Places: Gibeah; Ramah. Jonathan, Saul's son, became a devoted friend to David. Saul became jealous of David because of the honor the people showed unto him. As David was playing before him to quiet him when one of his [illegible] was upon him, he hurled a javelin at David in an effort to take his life. David made his escape. Saul heard that David was at Naioth and he sent messengers thither to take him. When they saw the prophets prophesying they also prophesied. Saul heard of it and sent other messengers, who also prophesied when they came near to Naioth. He sent messengers the third time and they, too, prophesied. Later Saul himself went to Naioth and so prophesied that people said, Is Saul also among the prophets?

VI. Topic: True friendship. Place: Gibeah. David and Jonathan made a solemn covenant to be mutual friends. Jonathan promised to protect David as well as he could, and David pledged to be a true friend to him. Jonathan made a plea for David before his father, but it was in vain, so he warned David to flee for his life. Their farewell was affecting.

VII. Topic: A [illegible] condemned. Place: Hachilah. So eager was Saul to take David's life, that he went in search of him with an army. David had already spared Saul's life in the cave of Engedi, and he went into Saul's camp at Hachilah where he could easily have slain him, but he had no desire to do such a thing. He talked with Saul, and Saul confessed his sin and promised not to injure David. David believed that Saul meant what he said at the time he said it; but he knew him well enough not to trust himself in Saul's power, for he could not tell when the evil spirit would gain control of him again.

VIII. Topic: Fidelity rewarded. Place: Hebron. Saul and three of his sons, including Jonathan, were slain in battle at Mount Gilboa. David was divinely directed to go to Hebron to be anointed king of Judah. After reigning over this tribe for seven and a half years he was again anointed, at this time being chosen and appointed king over all Israel. He removed his capital to Jerusalem. Saul's son Ishbosheth was accepted for a time as king over the northern tribes, but at length all the people were willing to accept David as king.

IX. Topic: A nation seeking [illegible]

[illegible]

XII. Topic: Comprehensive prayer. Place: Perhaps this psalm was written at Gath. Psa. 141 was written by David during a time of severe affliction, probably when he was fleeing from Saul. He prays that his prayers may be heard. He desires to have divine help that his words may be right and that he may be kept from ungodly acts and from the snares of the wicked.

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—A change of kingship.

I. The time of preparation.

II. The nation reorganized.

III. The abuse of kingly power.

I. The time of preparation. Divine sovereignty declared a vacancy of the throne of Israel. Through the prophet Samuel, Saul was informed that the kingship should not continue in his family, yet he was permitted to hold the throne during his lifetime. During these closing years he had the opportunity to prove conclusively to all Israel his real character and his inability to accomplish for them what they sought when they first demanded a king. In the meantime Samuel was called upon to anoint David to be successor to Saul. Without any declaration to Saul or to Israel of the change instituted or to David of the full meaning of his anointing, events followed preparatory to a change of kingship. Samuel withdrew from association with Saul and devoted himself to the building up a school of prophets, an institution of great value in later times. David's introduction into Saul's court apparently to employ his musical skill for the comfort of Saul in his seasons of despondency and ill temper, gave the youthful shepherd a glimpse into royal life. He became familiar with public interests and officials of the court. When called to Saul's notice on a second occasion, he was prepared to offer his services in a conflict with the Philistine giant, the issue of which should determine whether Israel or the Philistines were victors. From that period David figured prominently in the wars against the Philistines, gaining favor with the nation and experience as a warrior. Saul's nature being alienated from God, he sought occasion against David's life, rather than in giving thanks to God for victories gained for Israel. The Lord spread a table for David in the presence of his enemy in the friendship of Jonathan, Saul's son, a friendship that was as remarkable in its purity and constancy as Saul's purpose was in envy and malice. The years of exile and flight to avoid the murderous designs of Saul seemed a strange preparation for occupying a throne; yet the marvellous deliverances and the remarkable opportunities afforded to David to prove his loyalty to the Lord's anointed marked the divine [illegible] in sparing his life for a noble purpose.

II. The nation reorganized. The discipline of the years had so subdued David's nature that the vacant throne was no attraction to him except as God should direct his course to it. He exhibited true greatness when he consented to reign over Judah alone. It was to him the earnest of the whole kingdom. He could wait God's time and the people's choice. Judah's advance in choosing David confirmed the preeminence of that tribe over the others, as the one through which the Messiah should come. Abner, captain of Saul's host, continued the strife for supremacy in Saul's family. Contrary to David's policy, civil war ensued. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, but when the desire cometh, it is the tree of life," and so it proved when at the end of seven and one-half years Israel called upon David to reign over the whole kingdom. In the spirit of [illegible] David began reorganization and the establishment of a strong centre of government at Jerusalem, followed by the re-establishment of national religion. Long years of neglect of the laws of Moses with no worship connected with the ark of the covenant had reduced the people to ignorance and impiety. They were made to recognize God's living presence and his strict regard for obedience in their first attempt at removing the ark from its lodgment in the house of Abinadab. Under the strict observance of law [illegible] the ark was placed in the tabernacle which David prepared for it in Jerusalem.

III. The abuse of kingly power. Through perils of war, through bitter and [illegible] persecution, through delays of promised promotion, through [illegible] David had proved himself the man after God's own heart. It was when peace and prosperity surrounded him, when his kingdom was established, [illegible] he indulged in ease [illegible]

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. [illegible] feature of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to [illegible] THE GLOBE [illegible] per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the women's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

HOW SASKATCHEWAN FEELS.

Extracts from speeches at Thanksgiving mass meeting recently held in the City Hall, Regina, Saskatchewan.

"The clouds are commencing to break away and blue sky is appearing in Saskatchewan and it is going to spread to Alberta and Manitoba We will be able bye and bye to bring a little blue sky into old Ontario"

"We are on the eve of the finest temperance legislation ever enacted."

"Let us be thankful for this gigantic step forward in the cause of temperance and sobriety."

"The small places in the country will be given enough help to assist them in turning the bars into libraries and places which will be a credit to the town. Even Regina has them already where they are known as people's palaces."

AUTO ROAD HOGS

The phrase, "making them step lively" is the slogan of too many men who drive motor cars. In fact it becomes more and more apparent that car owners regard those who travel afoot, whether through inclination or otherwise, as a great herd to be "shoved" out of the way like so many chickens by the scream of a "warning signal.

The blatant "warning" signal is too often a "command" signal a sort of make-way-for the rajah injunction to those who still proceed on shoe leather.

While the majority of motor owners are considerate and unwilling to force a path by fear of death, there are many persons who should not be trusted behind a wheel. It makes them impertinent, and causes them to affect a superiority that is not at all warranted They try too much to "make them step lively."

The man afoot has more than an equal ownership of the streets with the man in the car.—London Advertiser.

BOOST FALL FAIRS

The Canadian National Exhibition Toronto, and the Western Fair, London, are advertising their respective fall shows, and they'll have as big crowds as on former occasions. These huge concerns believe in the power of printer's ink and their continued success year after year may well be attributed to this powerful beverage. No sooner have the exhibits left the grounds in one year than work is commenced for the next year. They never let up and the always-alert [illegible] of the management is bound to bring results.

What is true of the big fairs is true, in a smaller measure of the smaller fairs, and in many cases the failures may well be attributed to a lack of publicity. The work of getting up a successful local show cannot be crowded into the last three weeks preceding the fair.

Work for our local fair should be well under way now and no effort to make it a success should be lost sight of in the interval. To reproduce last year's prize list and the getting out of an announcement posted is not enough. The amusement part of the programme should be known now, and everybody should be led to expect something better than anything that has been Not only should the public expect something better, but the something better should be given. By promising, advertising promises and verifying every promise by giving everything promised, is the only way to secure and retain the public confidence and ultimately make for permanent success. To promise and not to fulfil a promise is worse than not making a promise at all. The public can't be gulled all the time. From now on the management should have to [illegible] the fair is to be "the best [illegible]

"For God's Sake, Let Me Stay!"

He pleaded with all the intensity his weakened body and soul could master. His voice trembled. Tears lurked in his strained, anxious eyes. "I have traveled for two days on the train," he said. "I have been turned out of my boarding house. I have been turned out of a hotel in my own town. The local hospital refused me admission. Nobody wants me. For God's sake, doctor, let me stay."

This man had been a railway conductor. He had money to pay for his needs, so he applied to the Muskoka Cottage Sanatorium for treatment of the disease which held his life in its grip—consumption. But those sufferers without money and without friends, what of them? With their hopeless knowledge that people shun them, they believe it futile to seek relief. If their lives are to be saved they must be sought out and supplied with nourishment, medicine, and treatment. To do this costs money. Will you contribute a trifle to help in this effort to save lives? Please act quickly. Winter has brought keen suffering.

Contributions to the Muskoka Free Hospital for Consumptives will be gratefully acknowledged by W. J. Gage, Chairman Executive Committee, 84 Spadina Avenue, or R. Dunbar, Secretary-Treasurer, 347 King Street West, Toronto.

A Rainbow at Night

A number of our citizens saw a large and distinct rainbow in the sky on Saturday night about 12 o'clock. The stars were twinkling brightly on either side of it.—No the gentlemen who saw it are among our best citizens and do not indulge in spirituous liquors. Wingham Advance.

It's pretty tough for the local merchants, clerks and deliverymen who have to work up till midnight and even later on Saturday, but they are deserving of little sympathy as the remedy rests with the merchants themselves, for if they got together and fixed on a respectable hour for closing, their patrons would soon be educated to do their buying earlier.

Waterloo Centenary Sees Great Battle

Eighty miles from the battlefield of Waterloo, where Napoleon was crushed 100 years ago on Friday, a French army hurled itself against the Germans before Lens in one of the greatest battles since the fighting of the Marne. More shells crashed against the German positions every hour than Napoleon used in the whole of that historic battle. Napoleon's army at Waterloo consisted of 71,947 men, a mere handfull compared with the forces at grips round Arras.

Back to the Land.

That the "back to the land" movement is growing, was never better demonstrated than when Mr. Dan McDonald son of John McDonald, ex-Reeve of Huron, purchased the Hawlew farm last week. Dan has for some years been drawing a big salary as superintendent of the plants drilling for oil in the Canadian West and the United States. The slump in operations came a year ago, and Dan came back to his own native land. After being pitched on the billows of life he decided that farming was good enough for him. He purchased 100 acres of first-class land, with a good house, large barn and the crop growing in the field.—Ripley Express.

Learn to Laugh

Learn to laugh. A good laugh is better than medicine. Learn how to tell a story. A good story is as welcomed as a sunbeam in a sick room. Learn to keep your own troubles to yourself. The world is too busy to care for your ills and sorrows. Learn to stop croaking. If you cannot see any good in this world, keep the bad to yourself. Learn to hide your aches and pains under a pleasant smile. No one cares to hear whether you have the earache headache or rheumatism. Learn to meet your friends with a smile. The good humored man or woman is always welcome, but the dyspeptic or hypochondriac is not wanted anywhere, and is a nuisance as well.

The Honor Roll.

In commenting on the death of Sergeant W. V. Hunter who was killed in France, the Southampton Beacon says:—The first of our Southampton boys who answered the call of their country last fall, and went to the front to battle for Britain and liberty has answered the last roll call and is now numbered among the heroes who gave their lives for their country. The eldest son is gone from the family circle and although there is a deep and general sympathy, the hearts in the home are heavy, but he lived a worthy life and died a noble death. Three times since last fall he had been promoted, first to lance corporal then to full corporal, and lastly to sergeant, merited for action on the battlefield. Death came to him in the Rawal Pindi general hospital, Wimereux, France, on June 11th, caused by wounds in the back from shrapnel. Word was received by his parents last Sunday, June 13th. Personal regrets have been received from King George, Queen Mary, the Dominion Cabinet, Rev. W. F. Brownlee, and many other friends.

Right Idea in Business

THE modern merchant filled with the modern spirit carries his business to his customers' homes; that is, he doesn't wait to be found out or risk the danger of not being found out.

The best carrier of businesses to customers' homes is the newspaper. Casualty List 9123.

The casualty list of the Canadian Army to date is 9,123. The killed number 1,444; wounded, 5,822, and missing 1,857.

While playing football at Mr. A. Bain's farm in Greenock one evening last week, Harry Johnston of con. A, Elderslie, had one of his legs broken just below the knee. He and another player kicked at the ball at the same time, their legs meeting forcibly, with the result stated.—Paisley Advocate.

Hope to Start in August

The Hanover Portland Cement Co. were forced to close down on Wednesday of last week on account of the retaining wall of their large clinker stores giving away. This was due to the fact that the building was filled to capacity. They are, however, working night and day and if orders continue to come in as they have during the past ten days they will be able to commence manufacturing again by the second day of August and it is hoped they can be in order to give their whole staff work again.—Hanover Post.

Looked like German Spies.

A travelling agent who visited Ripley last Thursday, got very much alarmed when she visited a certain house and discovered a number of persons talking in a foreign language. She immediately reported at the neighboring house that she suspected that German spies were in our midst. Upon investigation it was learned that there was no reason for suspicion. It was a Gaelic prayer meeting that was being conducted and all those present were true British citizens, who all spoke the Gaelic. Neighbors had a hearty laugh when they learned that those who were attending the meeting were mistaken for German spies.

The Thread of Life

In factories for making cloth of single thread rules the whole web. It is traced back to the girl making the blunder and the loss is deducted from her wages. But who will pay for the broken threads in lifes' great web? We cannot throw back and forth an empty shuttle, threads of some kind follow every movement as we weave the web of our fate. It may be a shoddy thread of wasted hours or lost opportunities that will mar the fabric and mortify the workmen forever; or it may be a golden that will add to its beauty and lustre. We cannot stop the shuttle or pull out the unfortunate thread which stretches across the fabric, a perpetual witness to our folly.

Walkers Close Their Distillery

Rumours have become current about Windsor to the effect that the huge distilling firm of Hiram Walker and Sons, Ltd. Walkerville, is about to close down for a period varying from fifteen months to two years. In contradicting this a responsible member of the firm authorized the local press to publish the following statement: 'We have always carried a large surplus stock to provide for any contingency and which would enable us to suspend our manufacturing operations for at least a season. Under present conditions the demand has fallen off in Canada just as it has in the United States and foreign countries. In view of this we have decided not to distill during the coming season.' This frank admission from Canada's biggest distillery and the manufacturers of the noted Imperial whiskey, would seem to refute the statements of the liquor interests generally to the effect that in spite of the increasing dry territory more liquor is being consumed.

THE TOBERMORY GUARD

The sentry to his post does go,
For two long hours to and fro,
He walks his beat like a soldier brave:
The lives of others he's there to save.

He walks his beat and has no fear,
When all of a sudden a noise he will hear.
He stops, looks round, and sees somebody there,
With a sharp voice he hollers 'Halt! Who comes there?'
And if he don't answer he'll halt him again;
And if no reply comes, he'll halt him again.
But the third time, that person a shot he will get,
Which will bring him to time, on that you can bet.

We go on guard on a morning fair,
And we all line up on the barracks square,
And we are inspected by Capt. Clark;
And everything's got to be up to the mark.

We go by regulations and rules,
Just the same as the children do at schools,
But just do something wrong, and then you will see
Your name on the Gate List with "10 days' C. B."

Now here's to the village down by the lake,
When we have to leave it, it's a thing we will hate
But we are right here and right in our glory,
So here's three cheers for the town "Tobermory."

Composed by Pte. Bert Etherton.

Last week a foreigner hit the town by "Shank's mare" from Hanover. The first night here he slept in the local jail but the second evening he started to make a fuss and a noise around Mr. R. E. Crane's house. Night Constable Ward was called out with a little forcible persuasion landed Mr. Foreigner in the lockup. Next day before Magistrate Miller, he was given three hours to get out of town or go to Walkerton for a short term. Mr. Foreigner disappeared.—Wiarton Record.

Valuable Rains

Much rain has fallen over Western Ontario throughout the past week—enough to save the crop situation for several weeks to come. As the days have been warm since the rains set in the growth of vegetation has been almost phenomenal. It will assure a splendid start for all spring grain, corn and roots and greatly help the hay crop which suffered a serious set back the latter part of May. Present indications for a bumper, and the country needs it. Crop conditions throughout the west are also reported good.

B. B. Patten Transferred.

A change took place this week in the personnel of the Merchants Bank staff, when Mr. B. B. Patten, who has been accountant for the past two years received notice of his being transferred to his home town, St. George. Mr Patten is an ideal official, and by his courtesy and careful attention to business made a host of warm friends here. He was a valued member of the hockey and football clubs, and his removal will be sincerely regretted in athletic circles. Mr. Patten's successor is Mr. McLean of St. George who entered on his duties on Monday. Mildmay Gazette.

Sent Boy to Home.

Dr. McLennan of Walkerton, who represents the Children's Aid Society, was in town on Tuesday, and took charge of Willie Mattheson. Mrs. Christy Mattheson, mother of the boy put up a strong protest against sending her son to the Home at Toronto, but the officer assisted by County Constable Martyn, had the power of the law behind them, and Willie was taken to Toronto where he will receive a training that will fit him for the great battle of life. His familiar little figure will be missed from the Ripley streets.—Ripley Express.

Shooting Accident

A serious shooting accident happened to Thos. Jones, aged 13 years on Thursday of last week which may cost him his life. The boy and his mother who reside in Teefield, Man., were on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. John Arnott of the County Line near Appanley. On Thursday morning the Jones boy along with two other companions went shooting and in some unaccountable way the gun in the hands of one of the other boys discharged, the bullet going clear through Jones's body below the stomach. The boy managed to run home but was very weak through loss of blood. Two doctors were summoned and are doing everything in their power to try and save the young boy's life. A peculiar coincidence is that the boy was shot in the leg two years ago under very much the same circumstances.—Tara Leader.

DO YOU BELIEVE IT?

No man can be popular unless he has learned to keep his troubles to himself.

A new broom sweeps clean but it never comes with the guarantee not to raise blisters.

Many a woman poses as an angel who wears her wings on her hat instead of on her shoulders.

In his effort to be known as a good fellow many a man shows evidence of overtraining.

It should be the constant endeavour of every man to deserve the good opinion he has of himself.

Unfortunately a weak intellect will not prevent a person from being headstrong.

It is quite superfluous for a man to tell a woman he isn't worthy of her. If she thought he was, she wouldn't want him.

It is a mistake for men to imagine women are always talking about their dresses. Sometimes they are talking about their hats.

There is one suit that never seems to fit, and that is a suit for damages.

There is only one way to get along with some people, and that is their own way.

About the only man in the world who doesn't want a fat job is the living skeleton.

It takes two to make a quarrel, and we seldom have any difficulty in finding the other one.

Too many men measure success by the standard of their own littleness.

The Superiority of Tone

In COLUMBIA Double-Disc Records is due to the Patented and Exclusive Columbia Process of Manufacture.

Columbia Records are BUILT UP. Instead of economising and using one mixture for the whole record, Columbia records are made in THREE LAYERS, using the cheaper material in the centre only where it doesn't count in the reproduction. The best and most expensive material the world can provide is used on the outer surfaces on which the sound wave or music is engraved.

THAT'S WHY COMUMBIA RECORDS SOUND BETTER and WEAR LONGER
—the same difference in value as there is between an ordinary pine and an expensive built-up oak door.

All Columbia records are double, a different selection on both sides.

And yet these records cost you less money than any others.

You are not getting the utmost value for your money or the best out of your machine—no matter of what make—unless you use Columbia records.

Of Course, Columbia Records are Made in Canada

If you have never tried Columbia Records, ask to hear the following selections. We will gladly play them and any others for you.

SIX NEW V. C.'S.

The latest list of V. C.'s for conspicuous acts of bravery and devotion to duty is:

2nd Lt. Geoffrey Harold Woolley, Queen Victoria Rifles, T. F.

Most conspicuous bravery on Hill 60 during the night of April 20-21. Although the only officer on the hill at the time, and with very few men, he successfully resisted all attacks on his trench, which was heavily shelled and bombed, and continued throwing bombs and encouraging his men till relieved.

Second-Lieutenant G. H. Woolley is the youngest son of the Rev. G. H. Woolley, Old Rithams, Danbury, Essex, and is twenty-three years of age. He was educated at St. John's School, Leatherhead, and Queen's College, Oxford. It was his intention to enter the church, but when [illegible] broke out he joined Queen Victoria's Rifles (T. F.). He is an all-round sportsman, and is stated to "hate fighting." He is the first Territorial to win the V. C.

6191 Cpl. William Anderson, 2nd Princess of Wale's Own Yorks Rgt.

Most conspicuous bravery at Neuve Chapelle on March 12, when he led three men with bombs against a large party of the enemy, who had entered the trenches. He threw first his own bombs, then those in possession of his three men (who had been wounded), then though at the time quite alone, opened rapid rifle fire on the Germans with great effect.

10523 Pte. Edward Dwyer, 1st East Surrey.

Most conspicuous bravery and devotion to duty at Hill 60 on April 20. When his trench was heavily attacked by German grenade throwers he climbed on to the parapet, and, though subjected to a hail of bombs at close quarters, dispersed the enemy by his hand grenades. He displayed great gallantry earlier on this day in leaving his trench under heavy shell fire, to bandage his wounded comrades.

Private Edward Dwyer, whose home is at 20 Linstaine-grove, Fulham, is only nineteen, and has been in the East Surreys for three years. Before that he was a greengrocer's assistant.

10631 Pte. Robert Morrow, 1st Royal Irish Fus.

Most conspicuous bravery near Messines, on April 12, when on his own initiative and under very heavy fire from the enemy, he rescued and carried back several men who had been buried in the debris of trenches wrecked by shell fire.

2nd Lt. William Barnard Rhodes-Moorhouse, Special Reserve, Royal Flying Corps.

Most conspicuous bravery on April 26 in flying to Courtrai and dropping bombs on the railway line near that station. On starting the return journey he was mortally wounded, but succeeded in flying for 35 miles to his destination, at a very low altitude, and reported the successful accomplishment of his object. He has since died of his wounds.

Lieut.-Commander Edward Courtney Boyle, R. N.

For most conspicuous bravery in command of submarine E-14, when he dived his vessel under the enemy minefields and entered the Sea of Marmora on April 27. In spite of great navigational difficulties from strong currents, of the continual neighborhood of hostile patrols, and of the hourly danger of attack from the enemy, he continued to operate in the narrow waters of the Straits and succeeded in sinking two Turkish gunboats and one large military transport.

The King has further approved of the award of the Distinguished Service Cross to the undermentioned officers of submarine E-14:

Lt. Edward Geldard Stanley, R.N.

Acting Lt. Reginald Wilfred Lawrence, R. N. R.

Approval has also been given for the award of the Distinguished Service Medal to each member of the crew of E-14.

DEARER FOOD

The British housewife's problem is becoming day by day more difficult. It is hard to find a commodity in general demand that has not advanced in price. Attention has been drawn to the butcher's bill. June will see still higher prices in many items of provisions. A big city store doing a middle class trade has prepared price lists showing the following among other advances:

Beef tea in 2oz bottles, from 1s to 1s 2d., in tins from 8s to 5s per lb.; beeswax 2s to 2s 3d per lb.; chicory, 8d to 10d.; smoked fish, 5d to 6d, and 6d.; tinned fruits, 1 1-2d.; and macaroni 1-2d. Oatmeal in 7-lb bags will cost 1s 9d today. Bacon is being advanced another 1d per lb.

Notable increases per pound since the war began are:

Butter, 2d, and 2 1-2d.; Bacon, 3d to 4d.; Cooked hams 4d to 6d.; Cheshire cheese 3d. Pork sausages 2 1-2d.

At the greengrocer's turnips have risen from 1d to 1s a bunch; tomatoes from 6d to 10d; and French beans from 4d to 1s per lb. Tasmanian eating apples from 1s 6d to 2s 6d for 5 lbs; carrots from 4d to 6d and 1s a bunch.

The fishmonger's prices have advanced on an average 25 per cent. Brill is 6d a pound dearer. Herrings cost from 2s to 2s 6d a dozen as against 1s ten months ago. Hake has advanced 3d per lb.; whiting 3d and 4d.; cod from 8d to 10d and 1s per lb. Salmon remains about the same at 2s 10d lb.

V. C. HERO'S DEATH

News has been received by the relatives of Private Robert Morrow, Royal Irish Fusiliers, who was awarded the V. C. for bravery on April 12 that he died of wounds received on April 26 while again trying to succour wounded comrades. It is understood that his captain again recommended him for the V.C.

Garibaldi Maid is No Revolutionist, But She's Right Up to Date

BY BETTY BROWN

The "Garibaldi" Maid has heard Italy's war trumpets, and while her war policy is of the strictly "non-intervention" kind, her fashion instinct has turned to the picturesque "trappings of war," and the Garibaldi gown "as red as the revolution" is the result.

Before Garibaldi's "red shirts" had answered the call to arms in Italy a few days ago an American designer [illegible] Madame [illegible] had launched the Garibaldi gown and it promises to become as popular as the Garibaldi red [illegible] were in 1860 when Garibaldi was leading the revolution in Italy.

The new Garibaldi frock is in red and [illegible] the [illegible] Georgette [illegible] flowing sleeves, and [illegible] black taffeta are [illegible] and [illegible]. The [illegible] taffeta is [illegible] the red [illegible].

Senorita Captivates Dame Fashion

"Dame Fashion, like the rest of the world, has capitulated to the spell of California and the California influence is noted in many of the season's styles," so Miss Alla Ripley, president of the Fashion Art League of America, told me as she showed me the Carmelita gown she has designed for exhibition wear.

Gold and black—the matador's colors—are used. The petticoat is of gold crepe and the overskirt of black velvet, the sash is gold satin and gold lace and black velvet are combined in the bodice.

Even in California there are so many cool summer days that the Carmelita gown may be worn without discomfort.

HEALTH

[illegible] the Bible [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Not so very long ago [illegible] it was considered a [illegible] virtue to be [illegible] dirty [illegible] wash. That was largely the case when the [illegible] was [illegible] and it has always been [illegible] the fact to this day in [illegible] [illegible] in the West, [illegible] was an attribute of [illegible]. I think it was [illegible] the mother of King Alfred [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible]!

However, [illegible] of the body, if not a passport to heaven, is [illegible] of the most [illegible] conditions of health, without which no [illegible] can be really healthy [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] are not clean, and do not [illegible] steady habits, nature will assuredly punish you for breaking the right way [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] carrying out its proper functions.

REMOVING WASTE PRODUCTS

[illegible] for [illegible] waste products, and if you are not [illegible] slowly but [illegible] the [illegible] poisoned by the retained [illegible] products of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] killing [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that [illegible] [illegible] all the time. Nature [illegible] [illegible].

The [illegible] at local [illegible] the [illegible] with the number of hospitals [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] is an [illegible] of neglect in this direction. [illegible] if [illegible] [illegible] the kidneys have [illegible] work and you [illegible] the disorder there. In the third [illegible] should you catch cold or [illegible] [illegible] will be [illegible] [illegible] in throwing it off, [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

CONVULSIONS

[illegible] "fits" [illegible] "fits." But [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

[illegible] children, from the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] convulsions, worry [illegible]. And it is a shame that [illegible] [illegible] to do so. The [illegible] is practically always the [illegible] [illegible], that [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible].

Convulsions are usually [illegible] [illegible] the dentition period, [illegible] it all a direct consequence of [illegible] [illegible] with the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] constipation. They are [illegible] supervene in the first stages of scarlatina, measles, smallpox, or any similar contagious malady. They may come on after any nervous shock or digestive trouble. Not [illegible] the source is intestinal worry.

But [illegible] the exciting cause on single [illegible] furnishes practically invariable foundation; without which there would be no "convulsions." The child suffers from constipation. Keep it in proper order in this respect and it will not be troubled with fits. As a rule it should not require [illegible]. Fruit, vegetables, rhubarb, should with proper care and attention render needless any resort to drugs. But if there be absolute necessity, nothing is safer or more efficient than the old-fashioned castor oil.

HAEMORRHOIDS OR PILES

This very prevalent trouble, the "emerods" of the Old Testament, seems almost a necessary consequence of our modern civilization and highly artificial mode of living. Yet it is easily preventable under most conditions and almost always kept [illegible] under restraint. The occasionally attendant bleeding, in fact, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] salutary. It is a sort of safety valve, and those who periodically experience it, were it suddenly stopped without provision in other directions, would be prone to suffer an attack of cerebral hemorrhage, otherwise denoted apoplexy. They are, as a rule, heavy drinkers of alcohol.

Piles are dilated veins at the lower extremity of the intestinal canal. You have there a tissue consisting mainly of small veins. These unite into larger trunks, which finally converge in the liver. Hence any congestive disorder of that organ is prone to originate haemorrhoids. And you [illegible] in a very large percentage of [illegible] the liver is the starting [illegible] trouble.

But any pressure on [illegible] their course upwards towards the [illegible] will have the same effect [illegible] [illegible] unduly squeezing the [illegible] be avoided. Of such [illegible] corset especially when [illegible] pregnancy, furnishes [illegible] example.

Then again people [illegible] who need not wear the [illegible] [illegible] avoid a very [illegible] disease in many shapes [illegible] culine or feminine, [illegible] better members of their [illegible] themselves into the [illegible] ble habits of [illegible] direct consequence of [illegible].

For prevention or [illegible] the [illegible] object to be aimed at is regular daily intestinal evacuation. [illegible] the proper habit then all [illegible].

HAD CHOLERA MORBUS.

SO BAD COULD NOT SIT UP.

Attacks of cholera morbus are caused mostly by indiscretion in diet, the use of unripe fruit and raw vegetables, and usually occur during the hot summer months.

On the first sign of this very weakening trouble Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken.

Mrs. George Ize, Rutherford, Ont., writes: "I was taken with cholera morbus, and I was so bad I could not sit up any more than five minutes at a time. My husband and I looked as if I had been sick a month. He got me a bottle of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and I took the whole of it in one day, and it completely cured me. We are never without it in the house for I don't think it can be beat."

When you ask for Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry see that you get "Dr. Fowler's," as imitators have gone so far as to imitate our wrapper both in color and style, and have adopted similar names, such as Strawberry Compound, Wild Strawberry Compound, Extract of Strawberry, etc.

"Dr. Fowler's" has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is acknowledged by all who have used it to be a sure cure for all bowel complaints.

Neutrality of Balkan Nations

"Will [illegible] the neutral Balkan kingdoms remain [illegible] is a question which is being asked [illegible].

[illegible] Roumania, Bulgaria and Greece [illegible] [illegible] for reasons of their own (based on past [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]) [illegible] in [illegible] matters with [illegible] [illegible]. All three kingdoms [illegible] confidence in the honor [illegible] of Great Britain, but [illegible] that [illegible] this [illegible] with an [illegible] and [illegible]. The [illegible] [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of these [illegible] itself on one side or the other is of another kind. It is that there is [illegible] conflict of [illegible] between the three kings and the bulk of the peoples. The kings are on one side and most of the populace on the other. Two of the kings are pro-German and the third is pro-[illegible]. They are at present strong enough to impose their will on the policy of their respective governments, because none of these three nations really wants to fight at all. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] last.

King Ferdinand of Roumania is a German and a Hohenzollern. He belongs to the family of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, like his uncle, the late King Charles. His sympathies in this conflict are with his ancestral house and with his race, and though they are by no means so pronounced as those of the late king, they dominate his policy. King Ferdinand of Bulgaria is German by blood, for he belongs to the house of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and Austrian by upbringing and sympathy. If he is Czar of Bulgaria, he is also a Hungarian magnate, and he never forgets his estates in Hungary.

King Constantine of Greece was born a Greek, but is Danish by descent, and his mother was a Russian grand duchess. His sympathies are colored by the fact that he is married to a princess of Prussia, who is the sister of the German emperor. He believes in the German army, and holds that the military reputation he won in the last Balkan war is due to German training. The consorts of the other two kings are also German [illegible]. With the exception of Serbia, therefore, all the Balkan royalties are joined to the Germanic powers by ties which they consider paramount. Quite apart from their [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to draw the sword if [illegible] can help it unless there is a chance of [illegible] outstanding the risks involved.

As to the peoples concerned, there is [illegible] that the sympathies of the people of Roumania are overwhelmingly with the allies. The nobles and the upper classes generally are specially French in sympathy and are bitterly anti-[illegible]. The whole nation dreams of the acquisition of the Hungarian province of Transylvania, where half the population is Roumanian, and greatly oppressed. Whether the aspiration [illegible] [illegible] is another matter, for the present western frontier of Roumania, on the crest of a mountain barrier, is most easily defended. Roumania also looks longingly at the Bukowina, where about [illegible] of the inhabitants are of [illegible] race.

The attitude of the Bulgarians is [illegible] They were badly [illegible] [illegible] the last Balkan war, and the recollection rankles. The [illegible] now in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Russia [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] quite [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Bulgaria [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. THE POULTRY WORLD

GROWTH OF YOUNG FOWL.

Here are some rough figures, based upon a few experiments, that may help you to ascertain whether your flock is starting off normally. And it would be a good idea to note their size at different ages and compare them with these figures to see that the rate of growth is normal or else deficient.

There is generally no marked difference in the rate of growth of chicks of different breeds for the first few weeks. Difference in size of individuals of the same stock are more marked than difference in average for different breeds. It is claimed by some that Leghorn chicks of the large kind will often weigh as much at ten or twelve weeks as Brahma chicks from stock of more than double the Leghorn weights. After that chicks of the larger breeds rapidly outgrow the others, and for a longer period. At about twenty-four hours old the average little chicken weighs about one and one-half ounces or a little less. At three or four weeks it should weigh one-half pound; at six to eight weeks, one pound; at nine to eleven weeks, two pounds. At three months chicks of the medium weight breeds should weigh from two and one-half to three pounds, the cockerels generally being little heavier than the pullets, though the largest pullets will sometimes outweigh the average cockerel. After three months chicks of the heavier breeds should gain in weight at the rate of a little over a pound a month, while the smaller breeds should gain at the rate of a little less than a pound a month, until from six to eight months old, when they should be full grown and of average weight for breeds of the kind, in good flesh but not fat. The smaller breeds meet their maturity a little sooner than the larger ones, but not a great deal sooner, the period of growth not being so different, but the larger breeds growing faster after a few weeks old.

Certain specimens in a flock are often noticed to grow much faster and longer than the average of the flock. They generally are a little ahead of the others from the start. It is not unusual for these specimens in the Asiatics to weigh close to four pounds at three months, and to grow at the rate of nearly two pounds a month for the next four months. This, however, is above the average. One and one-half pounds a month would be considered good growth for even the largest breeds.

All through the summer I would note those of normal rapid growth and mark them with leg bands to use them as breeders. I would certainly cut out of next year's breeding pen all stunted or immature pullets. This selection of the best pullets, together with the use of the trap nest will improve any flock until the profits from the flock are doubled on the average farm.

Ducklings grow much faster for the first three months than chickens. Ordinary Pekin ducklings weigh about two ounces when hatched. At three to four weeks they should weigh one pound; at six to eight weeks, from four to four and one-half pounds; at ten weeks, from five and one-half to six pounds. At this age well fed ducks are very fat, at which time they are generally sold for market. Those kept for breeders continue to grow, but more slowly.

A newly hatched gosling weighs about four ounces. At ten weeks any of the larger breeds should weigh from nine to twelve pounds. And at five or six months they should weigh from eighteen to twenty-four pounds.

Turkeys grow slowly at first. Some of the flock often seem to get a better start than the others. These make better breeders.

FOR MITES AND LICE.

The season for mites and lice is now at hand. Lice are perhaps not so injurious to hens as mites, and yet they make them uncomfortable, and perhaps less productive. In the laying contest at Storrs, Conn., the same treatment has been used now for more than a year and has been exceedingly successful. A salve or ointment is made by mixing equal parts of 50 per cent. mercurial ointment and vaseline. This should not be heated, but mixed thoroughly by stirring. An amount of this ointment equal to about the size of a grain of corn is applied about half an inch below the vent, smearing the skin over an area equal to about the size of half a dollar.

It should be remembered that the mercurial ointment is poisonous, and care should be exercised that none is left where the chickens can reach it. Two or three applications of this ointment a year will keep the hens entirely free from lice. The secret of its success lies in the fact that it kills the lice or nits and thus prevents a new crop of lice from hatching out.

SOME POULTRY FACTS

1. The meat breeds comprise the Brahmas, Cochins, and Langshans. The Brahmas are the largest followed by the Cochins, and they, in turn, by the Langshans.
2. Of Brahmas there are two varieties, the light and the dark.
3. All these breeds resemble each other in that they are large, slow moving fowls, with feathered legs.
4. There are four varieties of Cochins, and two of Langshans.
5. The Dorking is an old English breed. It is noted for its fine table qualities. They are being bred in this country.
6. The egg breeds are medium or small in size, and of a nervous, active excitable disposition. Of these breeds the Leghorns are most popular.
7. Laying hens should not be frightened. This will restrict egg production.
8. The egg breeds are poor sitters.
9. On account of their close feathering, the egg breeds are not able to endure cold weather so well as the more loosely feathered varieties of fowls.
10. There are seven standard varieties of Leghorns, and two of Minorcas.
11. The Minorcas are larger than the Leghorn and lay larger eggs.
12. The Hamburgs are the smallest of the egg breeds. They are good layers, but their eggs are small.

Coffee Beans.

Coffee grains are only the seed of a fruit which is very much like a cherry. It is very sweet and has a good taste. When the fruit is dried it shrivels up around the coffee grains, of which there are two in each one of the round balls placed with the flat sides together. Sometimes in the cocoanut kinds of coffee these little dried balls are found with the two coffee grains snugly held inside.

ST. VITUS DANCE IN YOUNG CHILDREN

Can Only Be Cured by Enriching the Blood and Toning Up the Blood.

One of the commonest forms of nervous troubles that affects young children is St. Vitus dance. This is because of the great demand made on the body by growth and development, together with the added strain caused by study. It is when these demands become so great that they impoverish the blood, and the nerves fail to receive their full supply of nourishment that St. Vitus dance develops. The remarkable success of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in curing St. Vitus dance should lead parents to give this great blood-building medicine to their children at the first signs of the approach of the trouble. Pallor, listlessness, inattention, restlessness and irritability are all symptoms, which early show that the blood and nerves are failing to meet the demand upon them. Here is proof of the great value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in cases of this kind. Mrs. Alfred Sachner, R. R. No. 5, Dunnville, Ont., says:— "Our ten-year-old daughter, Violet, suffered very severely from St. Vitus dance. The trouble came on so gradually that we were not alarmed until it affected her legs and arms, which would twitch and jerk to such an extent that she could scarcely walk and could not hold anything in her hands steadily. She suffered for about five months before we began giving her Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, but she had not taken these long before we found that they were the right medicine, and after she had taken nine boxes she had fully recovered her former health and strength. I can strongly recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to every parent having a child suffering from St. Vitus dance or any form of nervousness."

In troubles of this kind no other medicine has met with such success as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. You can get these Pills through any medicine dealer or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

BITES AND STINGS.

What is Best to be Done if Poison is Feared.

Bites and stings are common misfortunes. The bite of a dog, even when the animal is perfectly healthy, is attended with some danger. Physicians say that a healthy dog that snaps only at a moment of irritation will not often cause serious trouble. But there is always the doubt to make one uncomfortable. When there is reason to suspect madness, it is advised that the wound should be sucked and then cauterized with a red-hot iron or stick caustic. The latter is much the easier and is said to be just as effectual. After cauterizing, the wound should be dressed as any other burn. Baking soda made in a solution is very good to dress the wound. This latter is also very soothing for stings, though the remedy always at hand is usually good salt and earth mixed into a paste. Snake bites are especially to be dreaded, as the action of the virus from a venomous snake is so very rapid that help unless almost instant is likely to be too late. Sucking the puncture is recommended by medical works, although it is attended with some danger. If the saliva be instantly ejected, the result may be all that is desired. Liquor is usually given for snake bites, because the action of the virus is to paralyze the nerve centre. Ammonia should be ejected into the blood if there is any means at hand to do so. It would pay a family living in the country, where venomous reptiles abound, to keep a hypodermic syringe for this purpose alone.

PLANT PUZZLES.

What, for Instance, Guides the Vine in Finding Its Support?

A plant that actually goes insect hunting is among the latest of the scientific discoveries. It is known as the sundew. Its leaves, covered with tentacles, [illegible] a fly [illegible] touches them and [illegible].

This has long been familiar to the naturalists, but it now develops that the plant does not passively wait for its prey. If a fly alights within a half-inch of one of the leaves it slowly approaches the insect until close enough to lay hold and destroy, thus demonstrating the possession of some sort of sense or instinct with which plants are not usually supposed to be endowed.

Something of the same sort is manifested in that plant from seed, sending out a thin, threadlike growth, which winds in and out among the grass stocks until it finally approaches its natural victim. Then its growth is greatly accelerated. In a sense it fairly leaps upon its host and once there not only fastens to it, but multiplies with surprising rapidity.

If a stake be driven within a few inches of a growing sweet pea vine it will be observed that a tendril droops from a leaf of the plant in the direction of the stake. Forthwith the whole upper shoot of the vine bends in the same direction, and very soon the tendril is able to fasten on itself. The same observation holds more or less true with all climbing plants.

Vegetation of various kinds sends roots through distances, sometimes to be measured in yards, that they may reach soil or water below. Science is asking if the sundew knows that the fly is near. Has the vine a method of detecting the [illegible]?

The HouseKeeper

It is always annoying when using candles at dinner to have them drip, making the candlesticks look unattractive, besides spoiling the embroidered cloth beneath. If the candles are put in the icebox [illegible] about twenty minutes before lighting, they will give no trouble.

A teaspoonful of brown sugar or molasses added to the griddle cake batter makes it brown better and [illegible].

Be systematic — even the odds and ends of housekeeping should be attended to regularly. Set a day to attend to the drawers. In dressers and closets; examine storerooms and closets and see what is needed; look over fruit and vegetable cellar, taking fruit or vegetables that need attention and see that they are used before too late.

Grease the bottoms of pots and kettles before putting over the coals and they will not become black.

Use a sheet of asbestos laid over the top of the stove if you wish to make a large quantity of toast at once.

An excellent way to stiffen the collar and cuffs of men's negligee shirts or women's linen cuffs and collars is to use a starch containing gum arabic. Put two ounces of white gum, finely powdered, in a glass bottle or fruit jar, pouring over it one pint of boiling water. Cork tightly and shake until powder is dissolved. After 24 hours strain through a cheesecloth and preserve the clear gum water for use. Add one tablespoonful to each pint of cooked starch.

Paint the inside of bureau drawers with white enamel if you would have them always fresh and easy to keep clean.

THE GLORY OF IT

Multitude Mourned and Gloried Over Canada's Sons.

(By Lady Frances Balfour.)

The evening was falling, and as the sun went down to its rest, the doors of St. Paul's, London, were opened to the thronging multitude who remembered and mourned and gloried over the sons of the Empire.

A sky of golden opal, and below the bend down a man was scattering sand, as if it were golden seeds of the seeds of a glorious harvest yet to be. An hour before the service the congregation reached half down the nave, and Wellington in his monument at last looked up the nave, where, his lights, were hung the flags of Canada and Britain. Her blood-red banner streamed across the [illegible] and on the other side rested the great crosses, the banners of England and Scotland. Everywhere one saw known faces and tokens of the worship of empire. Here, against a column, a gray-headed general, who had first seen war in the Red River campaign. Lord and Lady Lansdowne passed to their places, now a year is in his grave since he governed Canada and closed the eyes of faith of his predecessor in office, who was a true seer as to the high call and destiny of Canada. Sprinkled throughout the crowd were the soldiers of our army at the front, and the tartan was worn by those Highland regiments who are akin in name and clan to the Canadian Highlanders. Canada came out as a clan to the fight. There in long row in the fading light sat those who remembered. High uplifted lay the figure with chiselled profile of the Iron Duke, and as the gleaming faded into dusk the lights came out along the emblazoned walls, and shone like two stars on the white and gold altar.

Simple and stately was the service, like often in many a village church, in the old homes, and in the wide new lands, and the kneeling multitude sang the words of the opening hymn, "Brief life is here our portion!" How thankfully we thought of these our brethren as the pealing voices of a people singing from their hearts rose through the vast spaces! "And Sion, in her anguish, with Babylon must cope!"

It was the history of Canada's army, how rapidly [illegible] came through her wide lands, and [illegible] a clan and a people who answered the call of her Blood and her King! Some thought they were to go straight against the foe, but it was a bleak day of discipline and hardship was to fit them for that [illegible] battle line and the glorious stand they made the day they stood and died. They were to die not in the glory of a [illegible] field, but in the very air they breathed, poisoned by the enemy they could not see. It made no difference, each a hero, and for "Christ and King," with "their backs to the field, and their faces to the foe, and leaving on earth no blot on their names, they looked proudly to heaven from a well-ended [illegible] fame."

Well might we, their brethren, leave in gracious keeping those "servants sleeping." When the great hymn, written by a Scottish archbishop, "The Saints of God, their conflict past," had been sung, then came the [illegible] of the Last Post. It was sounded by trumpeters in the choir, but every note rang clear and true as from the western walls, and out to the great gate which opened to the land of the setting sun. From the west they came, and in the east they died, and east and west their fame will endure in "sounds all victorious." London, from Westminster to the city, [illegible] with battle cries and [illegible]. On the site of the ancient [illegible] Palace the Belgian was telling the story of Belgium and her wrongs, and warning the allies that a false peace with Germany would be the ruin of the ideals of Christendom. Inside the House of Commons the Chancellor was fighting the battles against vested interests and those things which are the poison [illegible] employed against the living [illegible] of [illegible] and its combatants. FARM & GARDEN

GROWING CUCUMBERS FOR MARKET.

Growing cucumbers for pickles requires a medium, light, loamy soil. It is best to plow the land, selected for this crop about May 15 to 20, and spread it with 11 loads of well-rotted stable manure per acre. This should be run over several times with a disk harrow, thoroughly incorporating the manure in the soil. Then mark it out so that the hills are four feet apart each way. Some growers put a handful of good commercial fertilizer in each hill, mixing it with the soil.

Put from six to eight seeds in the hill. This allows for infertile seeds and damage by bugs. In some sections of the country insects are very destructive to cucumber vines. Care should be taken in planting not to get the seed too close to the fertilizer, as it is apt to burn the young plants, especially if the weather is dry.

After the plants appear, cultivate twice a week, keeping the ground loose and moist. Hoe the plants thoroughly until they are about six inches high, when they can be thinned out to four or five good, strong plants in each hill. This insures a good, even growth of vines that bear uniformly. To prevent damage by blight and insects spray with bordeaux mixture as soon as the third leaf appears. Follow this up once a week as long as the plants last. By spraying regularly plants will keep green until frost destroys them.

Picking usually starts six weeks after planting.

A successful grower of cucumbers for a pickle factory says he prepares the land well after heavily manuring, by plowing from two to four weeks before planting time. Then he harrows and plows shallowly, so as to retain the moisture in the land, for the cucumbers require lots of moisture to make a large crop. He is seldom bothered with the striped bugs, which would be troublesome if he planted earlier.

He generally plants a row of squashes along the outside for the bugs seem to prefer the squashes to anything else. He lays off the rows north and south, six to seven feet apart, and plants them from 18 to 20 inches apart in the rows, using plenty of seed, so as to insure two or three plants to a hill. He keeps the cultivator going so as to hold all the moisture and not let the weeds get a start. He hoes usually two times by hand, and cultivates almost up to the time they are ready to pick, at the last cultivating having to turn the vines. Then there will be no weeds at picking time.

NOTES

Rape is an excellent forage crop for upland lands. It can be sown at the last cultivation of the corn, and four or five pounds of seed, costing 15 to 20 cents, is sufficient. For an [illegible] forage crop for sheep and hogs rape is not excelled by any other crop.

To destroy injurious insect pests that infest the strawberries after the crop is gathered, some burn off the mow and rake the patch [illegible] if it is dry enough. Others [illegible]

A Michigan fruit grower with large experience and extensive peach orchards, says he has reached the conclusion that he will never plant a white peach. He favors the St. John for early bearing and the Elberta for late bearing.

To raise grain alone is not farming. It is simply robbing the land of its fertility. Yes, more than that, it is robbing the succeeding generations of their heritage.

Experiments have proven the average milk cow requires about an ounce of salt a day. Heavy milkers should have more.

Every weed you destroy in the orchard or in the garden before it matures seeds is one less to cause you trouble next year. One weed may produce hundreds of thousands of seed to give you trouble next year. It will be seen what it means to let one pest produce seed for next year's trouble. It is worth considerable trouble and expense to keep weeds from producing seeds. Cut them down before they go to seed.

Young pigs will need shade, water and suitable food. If the sows must be kept in pens, see that the pigs get out of the pens and have exercise. This will be necessary if the pigs are to make rapid growth and attain the proper development during the first few months of their lives.

The greatest care should be taken in the cultivation of corn late in the season. The corn plant has an extensive root system. Many of the tiny fibrous root often come within a few inches of the surface soil. For this reason no implement should be used in cultivation that would injure the root system of the plants. Shallow cultivation is desirable and the implement used should not run near the plants, where it would occasionally strike the "brace roots" above surface soil.

The best way to use the garden is to keep it busy producing vegetables all the summer. The way to do this is to plant such as beans, cucumbers, beets, sweet corn, radishes, etc., at intervals of ten days to two weeks, so long as there is sufficient moisture to germinate the seeds and give the plants a start. It will require but a few weeks to produce such vegetables when there is moisture. The hot summer sun hastens maturity, and little cultivation, as a rule, will be needed. Plant the garden crops.

The farmer having true ideas of aggressive agriculture and not afraid to put them onto practice is a brave, conceited fellow in the eyes of his less aggressive and slipshod neighbors. At first they sneer and shun him—later respect him, honor him and finally proclaim him king.

It is a true statement that too many farmers know how to produce food supplies, but do not know how to find a market or put them on in an attractive manner.

Little is gained by selecting large, stock trees instead of small, well-developed trees for transplanting. Nurserymen know that small or medium-sized trees are better than large, overgrown trees, but as so many customers demand the large, they must be catalogued and kept on hand. Smaller trees live better, grow faster and make a more symmetrical tree. This rule holds good with both shade and fruit trees.

Every rotation should be planted so that one or more legumes will occupy the land one or more times during four years. The legume will enrich the soil in nitrogen and make it produce a larger crop of non-legumes, such as roots, oats, wheat and grass.

Keep the young calves growing. Give them a little bran every day. A mixture of oats and corn makes good feed, especially so when clover or alfalfa hay is available for rough feed.

Say It.

If I wished to set forth a rule that would brighten homes and make human relations everywhere more human, it would be these two words: "Say it," the particular "it" being the word of kindliness and appreciation.

Am I not right when I declare that we have a tendency to say what is disagreeable and to keep silent at other times?

A man comes home from his day's work, and if his eye rests upon anything that he does not approve, he will vent his wrath without reserve. But he may come home day after day and find everything running smoothly, without giving a word of praise.

The woman who sits opposite him at the table won his heart once by her personal charms. The years, to be sure, have wrought changes in her, but if she is the woman I think she is there is a quality in that face now that was not there when he led her to the altar. How many months is it, though, since this husband of hers has made her think that the becoming dress she has put on for his homecoming is seen and appreciated?

The daily life is routine, but routine demands faithfulness, and faithfulness, though it be only the everyday sort, is worthy of mention. And it may be that a cheek beginning to dull would show some of the old glow if the word that does not get said were spoken once in a while.

The daily life is routine, but routine demands faithfulness, and faithfulness though it be only the everyday sort, is worthy of mention. And it may be that a cheek beginning to dull would show some of the old glow if the word that does not get said were spoken once in a while.

If we could but grasp the idea that we are here not only to live, but to make the best of life, to beautify and enrich each other, to bring out the best in each other, the best in life would be a better best and the possibilities in even such folk as most of us are would find a higher level.—Editorial, in Woman's World for May.

Try Some of These Recipes

(By Caroline Coe.)

When you buy strawberries, which kind do you choose—the big handsome red colored ones that please the eye or those smaller in size?

When you purchase the box of large berries you pay for considerable waste room between the berries which should have been filled with the fruit.

A box of smaller berries is nearer a solid mass of fruit and in serving makes more dishes than the box of larger berries.

Fancy berries bring fancy prices, while those of less size often are much cheaper and far richer in flavor.

Jellies and preserves are better if made of the small fruit, and have the advantage of requiring less sugar.

The large berries often have a pulpy centre that is not desirable and in many varieties they are lacking in flavor and are not sweet. Use the small, firm berry that fills the box and get berries for your money in place of air.

STRAWBERRY PIES.

Bake small individual pies by putting a rich crust over the bottom of each little muffin pan—bake crust to golden brown. Wash and stem berries. To each pint of berries add 1 cup of sugar, mash a little and set aside for 2 hours. When ready to serve fill crusts with berries, dot top with a little whipped cream, top with a big red berry and serve.

STRAWBERRY SHORTCAKE.

Make a rich biscuit dough of 1 cup of flour, 1 even teaspoon of salt, 1 heaping teaspoon of lard and 2 heaping teaspoons of baking powder. Mix these all together with a knife, then make a well in centre and add half cup of milk. Fold all together and turn out on board, cut in biscuit shape and bake in fast oven.

Wash and stem berries, add a cup of sugar to each 2 cups of fruit, mash slightly and allow to stand 2 hours. Have biscuits warm, split open, butter and add a little sugar, add a few whole berries, put on top and add more of the mashed berries, tip the top with a little whipped cream and serve.

STRAWBERRY SPONGE.

Soak 1-4 package of gelatine in 1-4 cup of cold water.

Add one cup of sugar and stir, then add 1-4 cup of boiling water and stir until all is thoroughly dissolved. Strain into dish and allow to cool; when cool add 1 cup of mashed strawberries and 1-2 cup of juice; beat all until very light and foamy, then beat in gradually the beaten whites of 3 eggs and beat until the mixture will hold its shape. Chill a mold, line the side with large berries (cut each berry in half and dip into the gelatine and they will adhere to the mold), turn in the sponge and set in cool place for an hour. When ready to serve turn from mold and serve with whipped cream and whole berries.

STEAMED SHORTCAKE.

Cream 1 tablespoonful of butter with 1/4 of sugar; add pinch of salt and 1 egg and beat till all is light and foamy. Sift 2 teaspoonfuls of baking powder into 2 cups of flour. Add 1 cup of milk to the egg mixture and then fold in the flour. Turn batter into well greased cups, filling cup only half full, set over in steamer and steam 40 minutes. Turn out while warm and put a little butter over top and then turn "strawberry dope" over and dot top with whipped cream.

STRAWBERRY "DOPE."

Mash 2 pints of ripe strawberries, add 1 1-2 cups of sugar, stir and set in cool place for an hour. When ready to serve shortcake, add 1 pint of whole berries and turn over individual cakes.

BLOOD THIN AND WEAK
TOO NERVOUS TO SLEEP

Here is Another Case in Which Dr. Chase's Nerve Food Proved Its Great Reconstructive Influence.

Thin blood and exhausted nerves usually go together. A considerable portion of the blood is constantly consumed in keeping up the vitality of the nervous system. Once the blood is deficient, either in quantity or quality, the nerves suffer and bodily pains result. Headaches, neuralgic and sciatic pains are the indications in some cases, while in others weakness, nervousness, irritability and sleeplessness are the most marked symptoms.

Mrs. H. F. Catlin, Elm Springs, Sask., writes: "For years I was troubled with nervousness, and could not sleep nights. Also had lack of color as a result of the blood being thin and weak. My husband saw Dr. Chase's Nerve Food advertised, and got some for me, and wanted me to try it. I did so and it has proven a wonderful help to me. By enriching the blood, it has restored color to my face and has built up the nervous system so that I rest and sleep well. It is a pleasure to recommend so excellent a medicine."

Dr. Chase's Nerve Food goes direct to the formation of new, rich blood, and for this reason is the most certain means of increasing the quality as well as the quantity of blood in the human system. The feeble, wasted nerves are restored, and through the nervous system [illegible] is imparted to every organ and member of the body.

You will be surprised at the way this food cure puts new strength and vitality into your body. [illegible] Edmanson, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

EAST BRUCE

The farmers are wearing a smile as long as your arm now the recent rains are the cause of it. Some of the older farmers say they never saw better prospects for the spring crops, than this year. Hay will no dought be a light crop with wheat an average crop. The statue labor is in full swing, it is hard for almost any one to keep the roads in good shape now with such heavy traffic and so much poor gravel The average farmer has not got enough of road work to do either, for his land is all farms of 100 acres should have about 10 days road work and large land owners should have the same in proportion as the small farmer. The poor man is always being kept down while the rich get off much easier.

The tenders are out for the concrete bridge over willow creek on the 8 th of Bruce. This is the most expensive bridge in the township the buttments will be about 20 ft. high with about 20 ft. of a span. This bridge has always been a dread to the Council and ratepayers for the expence and for fear of it going down. Bruce has not got a County bridge but a lot of small ones.

Mr. Geo. Fullerton motored down to Dundalk last week.

Jno. Geo. Brown is trying his exams for Public School leaving at Tiverton this week and last week.

How is it that a pupil attending High School take up less subjects and has not got to write on a exam but are permitted, while at a public school there is more subjects to study and an exam to try. It looks as if the Government or the Ministers of Education had something to do with it. But it is a disgrace and shame to think the like prevails throughout Ontario To think the High Schools are favoured in such a way, and other ways also.

LETTER FROM PTE. HANLEY

I have had but a short time at the front before I met with my little accident, but from what I have seen and the roar of shrapnel, flying every direction, coal boxes in the ground (shells that explode when they hit the ground and make a deep hole) one would wonder that there are not more killed and wounded. The closer we are to the Germans, the less the danger. The front line of trenches are very seldom shelled, because there is a fear of shelling their own men, so the only thing to watch out for in the front line of trenches is the rifle fire and bomb throwers. We all dread to be in the reserve trenches because there is no mark to shoot at and there is simply a continual roar of the shells bursting overhead and on the ground, killing and wounding many of our men. Outside of advancing on the enemy the large number of casualties happen in the reserve trenches where there is no chance to defend oneself.

I do not wish to tell too much about the horrors of this war, but to be conscientious about it, it is simply hell upon earth. Don't get it into your heads that we are in the least down-hearted, for it would be wrong to think so. For my part I am eager to get back to the front as soon as I am fit and play my part in the work. I hope the British and French will soon start using poisonous gases and annihilate the enemy in such a manner that they will soon be glad to go back to their own country and let the world be at peace once more. I understand by the papers that the Italians are progressing very rapidly in Austria. If the Allies don't soon use gas, there armies will be in a state of physical wreck. By that I mean that once a soldier gets a dose of poisonous gas, he is not in fit condition, that is, himself again, for at least a year or after.

I hope that you are all praying for peace to come to the world once more and but when the war is over peace may be restored so that there will never be such another hell come upon the earth.

Your son,
W. P. Hanley.

Word was received from Pte. Herman Monto, son of Mr. John Monto of Hanover, who was reported wounded several weeks ago, on Monday. Private Monto is not only wounded but is a prisoner of War in Germany.

THE PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

The great conflict in Europe continues unabated. The terrible struggle for the trenches in Belgium and France, from Ypres to La Bassee is still in progress. The Belgians, French and British armies are slowly but surely rolling back the German hoardes, trench by trench. True it is slow work, but even in this fact there is great satisfaction, for it shows the suberiority of the soldiers of these countries over the great machine, the German army, and with this in view it's no doubt easy to forcast the ultimate victory of the Allies and the crushing of German militarism. The price being paid is great, for the casualty lists daily rolls up into the thousands.

At the Dardenelles the advance of the Allies is slow and the task ahead of them of ridding Europe of the Turk is a long and tedious one.

Since their entrance into the war the Italians have advanced far into Austria's territory and are still advancing. They have already taken more territory by conquest than was offered to them by the Austrians if they would remain neutral. The success of Italy is due to her preparedness for the conflict.

Bad news continues to come from the northern battle line, where the Russians and Germans have been fighting for supremacy. The Russians have of late, owing to lack of munitions and arms have been forced to abandon almost all the territory they gained early in the war. After the fortress of Prsymel was recaptured by the Germans, the Russians have been forced to retreat hastily and they have fallen back a distance of over one hundred and fifty mile. The Russians, however, are making an orderly retreat, keeping their front intact, and taking with them all supplies, etc. The city of Lemberg was abandoned into the hands of the Germans on Monday.

When the ammunition supply of the Russians is replenished the tide of battle will again turn.

Good Prospects in West

In renewing his subscription to The Telescope, Mr. Colin McNicol of Indian Ford, Man., states that the part of the west in which he lives, has had lots of rain this season and the crops are looking fine. Like the majority of Westerners, Mr McNicol is not only well pleased with the crop prospects, but also with the downfall of the Roblin Government.

Successful Lawn Social.

The lawn social held at Todd's school grounds on Thursday evening last, despite threatening weather, was a very successful affair. There was an exceptionally large crowd in attendance, the proceeds amounting to $79.45 Of the amount $57.00 was paid to the treasurer of the local Red Cross Society, the balance being used to defray necessary expenses.

Brought to Gaol.

George Flach of Greenock was arrested and brought to gaol by Chief Ferguson on Monday on a charge of being insane. Flach was examined as to his mental condition on Tuesday but the medical examiners could not arrive at a decision and he was remanded until Monday. It is said that at times Flach is quite rational, while at others, his sanity is questionable.

Mentioned for Gallant Service.

In a list given out on Tuesday last by Sir John French, Field Marshall of the British Army, of those he recommended for gallant and distinguished service in the field, appeared the name of Captain J. J. Fraser of the Army Medical Corps. Dr. Fraser's friends in Walkerton will be pleased to hear of the honor conferred upon him and will extend their congratulations.

Finger Crushed

Eth. Leichenbach, delivery boy for Wingfelder & Krueger, met with a painful accident on Tuesday morning. Eth. was working about the gasoline engine in the shop while it was running and in some manner got the middle finger of his right hand in the gearing with the result that it was badly crushed. The accident has necessitated his being off work for a few days.

Frost Does Damage

On Wednesday night of last week a very heavy frost was experienced in this section and as a result the spring labors of a good many gardeners have come to naught. Tomatoes, beans, potatoes and all early vegetables were blackened and destroyed. The greater damage was done on the low-lying lands, while the gardens higher up on dryer soil the vegetation suffered little. So far as we have been able to learn no damage was done to the standing field crops.

Institute Meetings.

The Annual Meetings of the South Bruce Farmers and Women's Institute was held at Mr. Ab. Rowand's on Saturday last. A large crowd of members from the surrounding country were present. Prof. Day of the Animal Husbandry Department, O.A.C Guelph, addressed the farmers at their meeting, while Mrs. C. H. Burns of Toronto, gave an address at the Women's meeting. After the transactions of the usual business, the members adjourned to the lawn where a social hour was spent which was followed by refreshments.

Gave Liquor to Minors.

On an information laid by License Inspector Jos. White Herbert Schill of Formosa, a minor, appeared before Magistrates Tolton and Richardson on a charge of loitering on licensed hotel property and being found guilty, was fined $2 and costs. As a result of his trial and an information given to the authorities by Schill, charges of supplying liquor to a minor were laid against Anthony Opperman and Anthony Schnurr, hotel keepers of Formosa, and also against Heisz and Tracy, proprietors of the Formosa brewery. The defendants appeared before Magistrates Tolton and Richardson on Saturday afternoon and each on being found guilty was assessed $10 and costs.

"Summer Coon" Here.

The "Summer Coon" a knight of the road who pays Walkerton an annual visit, blew into town on Saturday. This gent, invariably becomes noisy and has to be locked up by the authorities, but on this occasion on being warned by the Chief, when he became bilious, he immediately left for parts unknown, and thus avoided taking his annual night's rest in the precincts of the lockup.

Will Stick by the Horse

Although several of his friends in Brant have purchased motor cars, Mr. Wm. Meihlhausen is still a firm believer in the horse as a mode of travel and his experience on Sunday has considerably strengthened his faith in the capabilities of his equine servant in this regard. Mr. Meihlhausen was on his way to the Carrick Camp Meeting and proceeded but a short distance, when he was overtaken and passed by two motor cars driven by farmer friends. He was somewhat dismayed at the time but farther along the road he passed both machines hung up with tire trouble, and had the laugh on his friends when he reached his destination some distance in advance of them. Mr. Meihlhausen says he will stick by the horse for a day or two still.

Fruit Crops Good

Mr. R. J. Hawthorne insurance agent of St. Catharines, spent Sunday with his family here. Mr. Hawthorne is optimistic with regard to the conditions on the Niagara Peninsula. He states that almost all fruits give promise of a bountiful harvest. The strawberries which are just in season are a full crop, the cherries which are ripening fast will be abundant, the all important peach crop, which was said to have been destroyed by frost in the early spring will be the best yield for many years. In fact in some localities the peach crop is so abundant that the small fruit is being cut from the trees to prevent the limbs from breaking for their weight later in the season. If the present fine weather continues there will be a bumper harvest of all kinds of grain and fruit throughout the Dominion and the pessimists who have been shouting blue ruin and expounding the starvation bogey will be doomed to disappointment.

Death of Rev. Father Gehl.

The community was shocked on Saturday last by the news of the very sudden death of Rev. Father J. J. Gehl of Formosa, Dean of Bruce County which took place in Drayton late Friday night after an illness of but one day, appendicitis being the cause of his death. Father Gehl was suddenly stricken while visiting in Drayton and as his condition was serious an urgent call was sent late in the night to Drs. McCue of Formosa and Sinclair of Walkerton and they left by auto for Drayton. When they arrived there, however, the patient was beyond hope, the appendix having already broken, and he passed away a short time afterwards. The late Father Gehl who was 59 years of age had been a priest for 30 years and has been stationed at Formosa for the past twenty years. He was not only well known in Bruce county, but throughout the province and his death is generally regretted. He was one of Formosa's most extensive property owners and it is said, leaves a large estate. The funeral which was one of the largest ever seen in this part took place to the Formosa cemetery on Wednesday.

Secured War Order

A deputation of local men comprised of Messrs G. S. Schwindt, D. Robertson, Jno Rowland, Wm. Shaw, Jno. Purvis, W. D. Cargill, and Senator J. J. Donnelly were in Ottawa recently soliciting war orders for the Walkerton factories and were successful in securing an order for 25,000 shell boxes and besides this were promised an additional order for 30,000. These orders will be filled by the Knechtel Furniture Company at their factory here under the supervision of Mr. Schwindt whose unfailing endeavors were responsible for the order being secured, and will be a great boon to the employees of the company who have been working short hours, as it will give them steady employment for some weeks at least at full time. There are what are called two-shell howitzer boxes, the size being 16 x 12 x 6. Although there is no specified time for the completion of the order, it is understood that it must be filled in about two months. Mr. Schwindt said the deputation are to be congratulated on securing this order and it is hoped that they will be able to secure additional orders.

BORN.

SCHAEFER—In Walkerton, on Friday, June 25th, to Mr. and Mrs. Wm Schaefer, (nee Miss Nettie Jarvis) a daughter.

WALTON—In Guelph, on Friday, June 27th, to Mr. and Mrs. R. Walton, (nee Miss Lottie Sanderson) a daughter.

WELD—On June 18, 1915, at 61 D[illegible] ware avenue, Toronto, to the wife of Stanley M. Weld, of a daughter.

Engagement Announced.

Mrs. Joseph Cullham, of Toronto, announces the engagement of her daughter, Olive Cullham Harris, to John MacNeill, minister of the Walmer Road Baptist Church, Toronto. The marriage will take place quietly in July.

Joined 58th Battalion

Thirty recruits left Owen Sound on Wednesday of last week for Niagara where they joined the 58th Battalion which is training there. Among these was Private Alex Gross who was at one time employed at the Knechtel factory here and besides his wife who was Miss Evelyn Runstadtler, he has two children.

The Football Situation

Quite a number of local football enthusiasts went to Mildmay on Friday last to see the WFA match which was scheduled to be played between the Mildmay and Owen Sound teams. They, however, were sadly disappointed, for the O.S. boys did not arrive on the grounds until eight o'clock and the consequent squabble which followed between the teams owing to their late arrival consumed another fifteen minutes. However it was at last arranged to play a short time and in thirty minutes playing in the darkness Mildmay scored three goals while Owen Sound failed to tally. By refusing to play the first game when ordered, Mildmay precipitated an unpleasant situation and Owen Sound arriving on the field almost two hours late did nothing to relieve it. Mildmay then declined to play the return game in Owen Sound on Monday as ordered by the W.F.A. We have endeavored to ascertain how matters stand, but have been unable to do so and settlement of the situation now rests with the W.F.A. and that body will have considerable difficulty in straightening matters out to the satisfaction of both clubs.

Walkerton 13, Chesley 0

The Exhibition baseball match between Chesley and Walkerton played at the exhibition grounds on Saturday afternoon resulted in a decisive win for the locals the score being 13-0 in their favor. Since their first game here the Walkerton nine have made several changes in their lineup and they now have a well balanced team with good prospects of landing the honors of the Northern League. The game was called at four o'clock and by the first three innings with the score 0-0, it appeared as though an excellent exhibition of ball would be witnessed. In the fourth, however, the locals broke away and tallied four runs. To these they continued to add in each of the remaining innings until at the end of the ninth, they had scored 13 runs. The Chesley players failed to connect with McNeill, who pitched a stellar game, and left the field without a run to their credit. The locals have improved wonderfully since their last appearance and during the game made but few errors. Following, was the Walkerton team: p McNeill, c McCartney, s s Runstadtler, 1st b F Anderson, 2nd b Wilson, 3rd b Wallace, l f Mullin, c f L. Anderson, r f Lawrence.

Guns in Church?

The Lutherans in many localities are pro-German and as a result of this they as a class of people, have come in for a good deal of criticism and are charged with being disloyal to the British cause. There perhaps is some ground for these accusations in some of the past cases, but so far as Walkerton is concerned the entire Lutheran Congregation, with perhaps, but one or two exceptions is loyal of the cause of Great Britain and her allies. Since the war broke out there have been many stories put in circulation with regard to the conduct of some of the local church members, but in every instance on investigations these have been found to be without foundation. The climax was reached on Wednesday of last week when, someone, presumably for a hoax, or being bent on stirring up strife and illfeeling, stated that there had been discovered, concealed in the basement of the Walkerton church, two hundred rifles and a large quantity of ammunition. This story came to the ears of the authorities, but on account of its absurdity declined to take any action whatever. The originators of this fool rumor has not been discovered but we apparently have in our midst some miscreants who are attempting to bring about a time in which a man dare not trust his own neighbor.

Bowling Notes

The Owen Sound Bowling Tournament is being held on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week and Port Elgin and Mount Forest tournaments the same days of the following week.

The rinks have been selected in the junior skips competition and the matches will be proceeded with at once.

In the senior skip matches this week Stephen defeated Rourke, Henderson defeated Lay, Robertson won from Pye, and Klein defeated Stephen.

Taylor and Stephens played a corner match on Tuesday, the former winning by a big margin.

Pumpkin Pie in June

No' we didn't enjoy it, nor did we see the pie, but we saw the wherewithal to make several of them, in the shape of a large pumpkin which was displayed to us on Saturday by Mrs. David Bell of Carrick. Pumpkins in June are an almost unheard of article, but this one which was one foot long by eight inches through, had been kept all winter by Mrs Bell and was still in an excellent solid state.

Gransden Still Alive.

For the second time since the first Canadian Contingent entered the trenches in France, the Herald and Times last week announced the death of Private Austin Gransden. This announcement, however, as on the former occasion has turned out to be untrue and Private Gransden is still alive in the land of the living. A letter dated in England, June 11th, written to his brother stated that he was then ready to leave the hospital and that he expected to rejoin his battalion and be in the trenches the following week.

Paid $20 and Costs.

The young man who was charged by Inspector White with giving a keg of beer to a number of minors on Sunday 20th inst., pleaded guilty to the charge, without a trial and was assessed $20 and costs by Magistrates Tolton and Richardson. Twenty-dollar bills are not picked up every day and this will probably be a warning to some members of the older generation who think little of buying liquor from the retailers and turning it over to youngsters for them to have a jollification. This was not a new experience for the boys who figured in the case and as the authorities are determined to enforce the law, they should also take warning and refrain in the future from asking parties to secure booze for them. It is very difficult for the authorities to secure sufficient evidence to make a prosecution in a large number of these cases as the minors who are aware that they personally cannot be punished, always have a fictitious story as to the source of their supply of intoxicants. If the minor law was amended to read like that pertaining to Indian Listers, as should be done, which forces anyone who is intoxicated to reveal the name of the party who supplied him with the liquor, or go to gaol, it would go a long way towards bettering conditions and keeping the boys of the country from acquiring a liking for the flowing bowl.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

He took his place on the high chair, shuffled the cards, and when they were cut, began the game. Davidoff withdrew slowly from the group of which he formed a part and advanced toward Jacques. As he did so he examined the latter attentively. When he was close beside him he took his outstretched hand in his rather like a physician than a friend. He felt his pulse, and shaking his head, said:

"You are feverish, Jacques; the life you are leading is bad for you."

These words of warning, uttered by the doctor, broke the spell which had held the young man. He no longer saw in Davidoff the mysterious personage, possessor of the secret by means of which life had been restored to his exhausted body, but a man like other men. He recovered his self-possession and said gayly:

"It would be bad for anybody. Yet as you see, it does not affect me had never loved Clemence as much as greatly. But it is excessively warm here. Shall we go out into the air?"

He took his overcoat, and linking his arm through Davidoff's they went out on the terrace. The night was a lovely one. The sky sparkled with stars. The waves died away noiselessly on the beach. To the north the lights of Havre shone in the distance. A profound calm reigned around. The two men walked for a few moments without speaking, turning over in their minds the events in which they had taken a part, and which bound them so strongly together. They had a thousand questions to ask each other. But the fear of saying too much made them hesitate about asking them. Jacques was the first to speak.

"You have just arrived in Trouville?" he asked the doctor, with affected indifference.

"The yacht of Count Woronzeff, whose guest I am," answered the doctor, "arrived in port about five this afternoon. We dined at the 'Roches Noires.' As the Count was tired, he remained on board, and Patrizzi and I came here to the Casino, where I knew we should find you."

"Ah, you have been hearing about me, then?"

"That you have been here for the last three weeks with Clemence Villa, that you play heavily, but with persistent ill-luck, and that your health is good—that is what I have been hearing about you."

Jacques frowned. "And you have heard the truth," he said.

"Is this, then, the use you make of your recovered health?" asked the doctor, gently. "Oh, you know, I do not wish to pose as a moralist or a preacher! You know that if I speak thus it is because I take a friendly interest in you. Clemence Villa! This is the woman in whose train I find you. And it is for her you play so desperately. Come, my dear friend, are you sure you are in your senses?"

"I am sure I am madly in love with her!" returned Jacques, in a stifled voice. "But I am not sure that it is in my power to avoid being so."

He fixed a troubled glance upon the doctor.

"I must not give myself time for reflection," he resumed, "for if I did I should easily arrive at the conviction that my existence was fraught with danger to others and to myself. No, no, I must not reflect. And the life you reproach me with leading is the only one that I can endure."

"But you are not strong enough to stand it," said Davidoff; "it will kill you."

Jacques laughed nervously.

"Do you think so?" he said. "Does it depend upon me? Am I not pushed on by a sort of fatality?"

"Take care," said the doctor, with severity. "This way of reasoning, which would relieve you from a personal responsibility in your actions, might serve as an excuse for a great many errors. You feared you were going to die and you are still alive—this is what is certain. Do not attribute this to any supernatural cause. You are cured of the malady from which you suffered. Are you the first to be cured of an apparently fatal disease? It was I who attended you; give me the credit of your cure, and do not put any faith in Pythagorean fancies that would make a child laugh."

"Did you laugh at them that night at Monte Carlo when you told us that story?"

"Eh! did I say I believed in what I was telling you? After an excellent dinner spiritualism was brought on the table, and the transmigration of souls discussed in all its bearings. I took my part in the discussion, but if you wish to know my real opinion in the matter, I am a materialist. Consequently I cannot admit that a body is animated by an element of which I do not acknowledge the existence."

"How then was I saved from death?" asked Jacques, with a trembling voice.

"You were saved because the disease you were suffering from took a favorable turn and the abscess in your right lung was healed, thanks to the treatment you followed, aided by the salutary influence of the climate. What do you see miraculous in that? Every year cures equally wonderful occur, without their subjects suffering on that account any mysterious disturbances of mind."

They had stopped at the edge of the water, which gleamed in the moon's rays like silver. Jacques was silent for a moment; then, as if he wished to cast off a weight that was pressing the life out of him, he said:

"And Pierre Laurier?"

"Pierre Laurier had lost his senses," responded Davidoff in a grave voice, "and you know what made him lose them. Jacques, I wish I could restore you to yourself, and show you how fatal is the life you are leading, and what is the true character of the woman for whom you sacrifice everything."

"Be silent!" cried Jacques with violence. "I cannot permit you to speak of her in this way before me."

"On the night of Laurier's disappearance," continued the Russian physician, "he it was, not I, who launched out in abuse of Clemence. He cursed her. Yet he returned to her. Come, Jacques, be reasonable for an instant, and see things as they are. What I said to Pierre on that fatal night, standing on the seashore, as we are standing now, under a starry sky and on a night like this, I repeat to you. He answered me that it was no use, that he had not the strength to follow my advice. He left me, and I never saw him again. But at least he was alone in the world. You have a mother, a sister—think of them. Do you wish to make them wretched?"

"I make them wretched already, Davidoff," answered Jacques, with anguish. "I cause them many anxieties, many cares, many torments. They are very unhappy, and through my fault. Oh, I know how culpable I am, and I am all the more so because they are so gentle and resigned. You have not seen my sister since your return. It will frighten you to see how feeble and dejected she is. None of the doctors have been able to discover the cause of her malady. But my mother and I know what it is. You, too, may have guessed it. The wound from which she is suffering, and which will finally kill her, is in the heart. She loved Pierre Laurier, and she cannot be consoled for his death. She confessed it to me before we returned to Paris. And I, wretch that I am, received the avowal of her hopeless passion with distrust, almost with hatred. It seemed to me as if she reproached me with the death of him she mourned, and I turned away with irritation from the poor child, instead of consoling her and mingling my tears with hers. I felt the life of Laurier flow in my veins; he had bequeathed it to me; it belonged to me. I had passed so recently through the anguish of sickness, I was so impressed with the horror of death, that I think I would have committed murder in defence of the life so miraculously saved. And I threw myself like a madman into a life of pleasure to silence my reason, to make my conscience dumb. But I am a coward—yes, a coward. And the life I lead is the proof of it! Davidoff, if I [illegible] recall Laurier to life! It would be the salvation of poor Juliette who knows, perhaps mine also. Yes, if I saw Laurier alive, I should recover confidence in my own strength, and I should cease to believe in the supernatural aid which, whatever you may think, has sustained me up to the present. I should then have the proof that I could live as others live. Or if not, the slender flame of life would be extinguished, and then I should enjoy rest, tranquillity, oblivion. Ah, it would be delightful! For I am weary of it all—yes, weary!"

Jacques heaved a sigh, and his head sank upon his breast. A shudder ran through him, and his forehead was bathed in perspiration. The Russian observed him with compassionate attention.

"You are ill, Jacques," he said. "The sea breeze is chilly; you must not stay here."

"What does it matter!" answered the young man with indifference. "Neither the cold nor the heat can affect me. I feel a great relief at having told you what you have just heard. I am a poor creature, and for a long time past I have been the victim of evil influences, which I do not know how to overcome."

"Very well, then, if you are aware of your fault do not persist in it. You told me a moment since that your mother is unhappy and your sister ill on your account. Let us leave this place to-morrow, and return to Paris. Let us go to them. You will console your mother and I will take care of your sister. Your presence will do them both good—not to speak of the benefit you yourself will derive from your visit. After your act of confession, make an act of reparation! Are you a man, and do you wish to behave like a man?"

Jacques seemed disturbed by the plainness of the doctor's proposition. His features were contracted. The sole thought of leaving Clemence agitated him, afraid as he was of the way in which she should spend her time during his absence.

"Is it then necessary that we should go to-morrow?" he said. "Can we not defer our departure for a few days? I want time to get ready."

"No!" replied Davidoff, brusquely. "If we put it off you will not go. To-morrow, or I will never again speak to you, or recognize you as a friend."

As the young man still hesitated—

"Why do you hesitate?" he asked. "Are you not a free agent, or must you ask permission to go away? Has it come to that? That would be worse than I had supposed."

"You are mistaken," cried Jacques, "and I will give you the proof of it. Till to-morrow, then."

"Without fail? Without any putting off or making excuses?"

"Count upon me."

"Very well. Let us retire, then, so as to be ready for the morning."

They passed through the Casino out into the air. Before the railing a carriage was in attendance. They awakened the coachman, who was fast asleep upon his seat, and entered the vehicle after Jacques had given orders to stop at the entrance to the town. They rolled slowly through the sleeping streets. They were both silent, meditating on the engagement they had just made. The stopping of the carriage drew them from their reflections. They were now on the quay before the harbor. A hundred yards away, fastened by a cable to the land, the beautiful white yacht lay at anchor. The doctor alighted from the carriage, and once more pressing Jacques' hand in his, as if to give him strength, said:

"Courage! Good-night. I will call for you in the morning—it is on my way."

"No, no," said Jacques quickly. "Spare yourself the trouble; we will meet at the station."

"Be it so—an hour, then, before the train starts we will dine together at the buffet."

They separated, and the carriage drove off in the direction of Deauville. The doctor, crossing to the yacht, sprang on board.

Toward nine o'clock in the morning Davidoff was wakened from his sleep by a hand laid upon his shoulder. He opened his eyes. Count Woronzeff stood before him. Through the porthole of the cabin could be seen the blue sky, and the rays of the sun, reflected from the undulating surface of the water, played capriciously on the maplewood partition.

"You have slept soundly this morning," said the Russian nobleman with a smile. "This is the second time I have tried to waken you."

"What is the matter, my dear Count? Is any one ill on board?" cried the doctor.

"Happily, no. I only wanted to know what your plans for the day were, before giving my orders. I have a fancy to go to Cherbourg. Would you like to go?"

"Excuse me, my dear Count," answered the doctor, "but I am going to Paris for a few days, if you have no objection to interpose."

"None whatever. Please yourself. But you see how right I was in speaking to you. What would you have said if we were out at sea when you awoke?"

"You do not know how serious the consequences might have been if such a thing had happened," answered Davidoff.

"Well, get up. When I have set you on shore I shall put out to sea, and on your return here you will find me in the same place. But what takes you to Paris, where it is so warm, when it is so delightfully cool here?"

"A love-affair," responded the doctor, seriously. "A poor young man whom I am trying to separate from a coquette, who —"

"Say at once a woman," interrupted the Count; "that will be shorter and express the same thing. My dear fellow, trust a man who has been made frightfully unhappy by them, there is only one system to adopt with women—that which the Orientals have have adopted—slavery pure and simple. Tell your friend this from me."

"To tell it to him is easy enough; the difficulty is to make him believe it. He has indeed arrived at your system of slavery, only it is he who is the slave!"

"Poor devil! Good luck to you, then, Davidoff."

The Count lighted a cigarette, pressed his friend's hand and left the cabin. An hour later the yacht was steaming out to sea.

On reaching the railway station the doctor found it vacant. The train was not to leave for some time yet. He went into the waiting-room; there was no one there. In the dining-room the woman at the desk was yawning over yesterday's paper. A commercial traveler, his box of samples on the floor beside him, was taking an appetizer. Davidoff went out and walked slowly in the sunshine, looking around to see if Jacques were coming. At the end of twenty minutes he grew impatient, and walked in the direction of Clemence's house at Deauville. As he went on he thought to himself:

"What does this delay mean? Has he given up the thought of accompanying me? What new idea has taken possession of him? Yet he appeared to be in earnest yesterday. But he has seen that accursed woman again, and all his good resolutions have vanished. Who knows? Perhaps he has told her of our interview, making a merit of his treachery. In the state of impatience in which he is, anything is possible."

The doctor, thus soliloquizing, had now reached the house. He raised his eyes to the windows. They were wide open. In the courtyard a groom was washing a victoria, rapidly turning round the wheels, whose wet sparkled in the sunlight.

"I must know, in any case, what to count upon," he said.

And he deliberately mounted the steps leading to the terrace and entered the hall.

A servant came toward him.

"M. Jacques de Vignes?" the doctor asked.

"M. de Vignes is not here," answered the servant.

"Is he expected to return?"

"I do not know."

"Is Mme. Villa at home?"

"Madame is in the conservatory."

"Give her this card and ask her if she will receive me."

The servant withdrew. The doctor took a few steps in the hall, letting his gaze dwell absently on the furniture of sculptured oak, the jardinieres filled with flowers, the Faience plaques fastened to the walls, and the large Chinese porcelain jars filled with parasols of different colors and with canes of different kinds of woods. "Clemence may give me a useful hint," he was saying to himself. "I am going to beard the lion in his den. Bah! I am not afraid of her. She devours only those who are willing to be her prey."

A portiere was drawn aside and the servant reappeared.

"If Monsieur will follow me—" he said.

They crossed a drawing-room and a boudoir, and stopped before a glass door that led into the conservatory. The servant stepped aside to allow Davidoff to pass. Along a little path, bordered with lycopods, which wound among palm trees, dates, and acacias, Clemence, dressed in a rose-colored foulard silk, fastened around the waist by a girdle of chased silver set with garnets, a little watering-pot in her hand, advanced smilingly to meet him.

"Good day, doctor," she said. "What happy chance brings you here?"

With a gracious gesture she showed him her hand, blackened with earth, and continued gayly:

"I am the physician of the flowers. I was just holding a consultation respecting these plants."

"Are they doing well?"

"Not so badly, thanks."

She showed him her watering-pot.

"I have just been giving them some remedy," she added. "But to what am I indebted for the pleasure of your visit?"

"May I not have come simply to see you?"

She looked at him coldly.

"You are very amiable. I am obliged for your politeness, but I know you. You are not a lady's man. If you come to see me it is because you have some serious reason for it."

"Well, then, I have a reason. I had an appointment with Jacques this morning which he failed to keep. I feared he might be ill—"

"Ah!" interrupted Clemence, with a thoughtful air.

She went toward a little bridge on which were an iron table and some chairs and seating herself, said:

"Ill! He is so indeed!"

And tapping her forehead with her finger: "Ill here, especially," she added.

As Davidoff remained silent, curious to learn the secret of this friendship which he deemed perilous to Jacques, she resumed:

CHILDREN'S VALUE.

"Children have no economic value" is a harsh word. They have a finer value. Their sweets are chubby hands and unused faces, smiles that refresh their elders of a wholesomeness incomparable and a wealth of loving that makes life sweet for those who might find it bitter.

Minard's Liniment Cures Distemper.

Why Milk Sours Quickly.

We are told by those who study the ways and ravages of the mischievous microbe that he is very fond of sugar, and that he delights to gratify this liking by turning the sugar in milk into an acid which sours the milk. These microbes are constantly in the air, alive, though invisible, and ready.

If it were possible to keep the milk from the air after the cow is milked it would not turn sour.

Warm milk is particularly inviting to the microbe and favorable to his operations. He does not get along well under chilling conditions, and that is why the sweetness of milk can be preserved if it is kept cold.

Boiling fresh milk changes the sugar in such a way that the microbe cannot feed upon it.

I fell from a building and received what the doctor called a very bad sprained ankle, and told me I must not walk on it for three weeks. I got MINARD'S LINIMENT and in six days I was out to work again. I think it the best Liniment made.

CAN'T BLAME THE PAPER.

(Chicago Tribune.)

We are willing to defend and uphold the weather bureau, but we cannot with safety carry this burden of accountability. A newspaper has enough to do to stand for its own mistakes. Telling the truth of what has happened is a sufficient task, without attempting to tell what will happen when weather is the controlling factor. We publish the forecasts; we do not make them. We must insist upon a strict limitation of responsibility. "The paper says" nothing at all about the weather. The government says it.

BABIES' MILK.

A Point Which the Mother May Well Consider.

An important particular in which cow's milk differs from mother's milk for feeding infants is that the former is likely to curdle.

Some children fed on cow's milk are apt to suffer from the conformation of large, tough curds. If citrate of soda is added to milk in the proportion of half a dram of soda to a pint of milk, no curds will be formed.

Given in this proportion citrate of soda is said to be entirely harmless and is often found very useful in feeding infants. The addition of barley water or any other thin cereal gruel has much the same effect.

MUST WORK FOR PURITY.

(Exchange.)

If affairs in the political world are not as they should be, how are they going to be remedied? Is it to be brought about by men of ability and talent standing back and saying that the political "game" is a thing unclean, and "I am not going to touch it with my clean hands?" Nothing is more certain to make it easier that the ward heeler and the ballot switcher will get a stronger hold on the political machine, and will wield a bigger influence in the party councils.

GUARD BABY'S HEALTH IN THE SUMMER

The summer months are the most dangerous to children. The complaints of that season, which are cholera infantum, colic, diarrhoea and dysentry, come on so quickly that often a little one is beyond aid before the mother realizes he is ill. The mother must be on her guard to prevent these troubles, or if they do come on suddenly to cure them. No other medicine is of such aid to mothers during hot weather as is Baby's Own Tablets. They regulate the stomach and bowels and are absolutely safe. Sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

The Butterfly's Eye Spots.

What do the eye spots on butterflies' wings mean? The naturalist, says Mr. Percy Collins, must answer, frankly, "I do not know." It is thought that they have some utilitarian application, and they form one of the most intricate of all natural designs. The fact that butterflies have been captured with their eye spots pierced, as if from attack of birds, has been used as an argument in favor of the view that they must be "protective" markings, imitating eyes, because birds strike at the eyes of their victims. But the suggestion is hardly regarded as satisfactory. Among butterflies the most striking examples of eyespots are found on the under-surface of the wings.

Byron at Ostend.

At one time Ostend was a great fortress looking out over the North Sea through her menacing loophole upon the sails of Vikings. A century ago Byron made his memorable flight, not from, but to Ostend, in terror of Scandal bailiffs who were laying siege to his mansion in Piccadilly. The poet made the journey to Dover in his magnificent £500 coach, but had to wait until a storm abated before the mail packet felt it safe to set sail. That Byron was far from seasickness in his crossing "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage" testifies.—London Standard.

Preserving Eggs.

Every family that uses a dozen or more eggs per week can put a sufficient number in storage to carry them through the fall and early winter. A satisfactory preservative is silicate of soda, commonly called water glass, which can be purchased at a cost of from 40 cents to 50 cents a gallon. This should be used at the rate of one part to nine parts water and the eggs completely covered with the solution. A galvanized iron or wooden receptacle may be used for this purpose.—Springfie'd Republican.

Close Packing Best.

Most people are afraid of crushing their clothes by packing them too tightly, yet this is the secret of successful packing. FOR HOUSEWIVES.

Many New Wrinkles to Aid Them in Their Work.

Manufacturers are supplying many practical aids for housekeepers. There is to-day a convenient utensil for almost every sort of labor, even to the conserving of room and fuel consumption by the use of cunningly arranged utensils which, like the triple saucepan, will cook three foods over one gas burner.

Among cleaning agents there are two recent additions to the list that are well worth while; one is the copper wire dish cloth which comes in three sizes for the cleaning of pots and pans and is much more effective than the chain cloths, as it does not chip or crack the enamel. The other is steel wool; this comes in a roll and a little bit pulled off, which has the feeling of a bunch of horse hair and looks not unlike it, will clean enamel over the surface. It may also be used for brasses and glassware. Use with it a non-alkali soap, if any, and always rinse the article and polish with a dry cloth after it is cleaned.

"Holdfoam flagons" will appeal to the housekeeper who has had her favorite pitchers one by one broken off in refrigerator use. The flagons are of heavy glass, metal-protected by a skeleton frame and handle, and have a porcelain snap top. They are good for milk, lemonade or anything that one desires to have cooled next the ice. They may be purchased in several sizes at moderate cost.

The gas table-grill will be found very convenient for breakfast table use. One may use it for broiling, toasting, waffle or pancake making, or simply to keep the platters hot so that their contents will remain inviting for lagging members of the family.

Another grill is that to use with the solid alcohol burner and is especially adapted for porch use where even the club sandwich is made on the spot, the bacon and toast being prepared by the hostess on the grill while the guest waits.

The newest casserole dish is bowl-shaped, of copper with a lining of sterling silver; it has a hardwood copper tipped handle which screws on to the side of the dish after it is taken from the oven. The knob on top of the heavy cover is also of hard wood heavily tipped, like the handle, with copper so that the oven heat has no effect upon it.

Just now the square dish pan with wire drawer is bidding lustily for popularity. It has a chain and plug which, when lifted, drain the water out through the wire drawer underneath, which is the same depth as the height of the four legs on which the pan stands. In the drawer all large crumbs or scraps are caught and may be easily emptied into the garbage can.

The mushroom shaped potato masher finds favor with experienced cooks and chefs. It is a good pulverizer for hard fibrous vegetables that need to be put through a strainer, and it is indispensable in puree making, owing to its broad satiny surface.

A Great Surprise.

There are lots of haps and mishaps during a play that are not down on the bills. One incident is related by a manager while playing in a small town. Ice cream was supposed to be used in one of the scenes, but not being able to get it cream cotton was used on dishes as a substitute. The characters were sitting around the table, presumably eating ice cream and cake. In the centre of the table was a candelabrum, and the candles were burning. The leading lady, while talking, got her dish of ice cream too near the candles, and, to the surprise and amusement of the audience, the ice cream caught fire and burned merrily until the curtain was lowered.

NEWSPAPERS AND WAR.

(Guelph Mercury.)

The war has been a serious matter for the newspapers. From a commercial side, it has hit them just the same as it has many other lines of business. It's been a perpetual round of increasing expenditure and decreasing revenue.

From an editorial and news point of view it's been a nightmare. Does anyone suppose that a man can go on piling up scare heads about thousands of men being killed and wounded—among them our own kith and kin—without feeling it?

The war has meant the cancelling and curtailing of features that should have a prominent place. It has tended to exaggerate minor movements, and to a large degree it has thrown the whole newspaper machine out of joint.

It will be a happy day again when a runaway with no one hurt can get into the corner of the frontpage, and a church social will be considered once more of sufficient importance to assign a reporter to cover it.

LIFE INSURANCE FACTS.

Distributions by life insurance organizations in the United States and Canada amounted to $686,700,000 in 1914, as computed by the Insurance Press. The amount was the largest on record, exceeding by $10,150,000 the amount of the distributions in 1913. Under the policies of the level-premium companies and the certificates of life insurance organizations on the assessment basis, the payments in the two countries for death claims, matured endowments and other benefits amounted to $423,050,000. For premium savings, for the cash values of policies that were surrendered, for annuities, and to the beneficiaries under policies issued in foreign countries the regular companies of the United States and Canada paid amounts, estimated in part, that aggregated $253,650,000.

Summation of life insurance payments of all kinds in 1914:

Claims paid in the United States and Canada..	$433,050,000
Payments for premium savings and surrender values, and to annuitants, and in foreign countries	253,650,000
Grand total..	$686,700,000

The unfavorable feature of life insurance in its dealings in 1914 was the large increase of the amount paid on account of policies surrendered at cash values. The increase of the policy loan account was more than normal. The amounts of the ordinary and industrial policies written and revived in the United States by the regular companies that accounted for 91 per cent. of the regular life insurance disbursements in the United States amounted last year to more than $102,500,000, an increase of more than $15,160,000 over the amount paid in 1913. For 1913, the increase was about $3,350,000; 1912, $8,200,000; 1911, $2,853,000.

More than 194,000 policies of ordinary life insurance to the amount of more than $381,300,000 were surrendered to American life insurance companies in 1913. Industrial life insurance to the amount of more than $24,200,000 was surrendered also. The record for 1914 is not available at present. The record of the payments for death claims and matured endowments last year by the companies that transacted 94 per cent. of the business showed increase to the amount of $17,760,000 compared with increases to the amount of $5,530,000 in 1913, $14,890,000 in 1912, and $13,480,000 in 1911. Analysis showed about $11,100,000 for increase of death claims and $6,660,000 for increase of endowment payments, compared with $3,730,000 for increase of death claims and $1,800,000 for increase of endowments in 1913.

The endowment payments to the amount of nearly $59,000,000, as reported last year by the companies mentioned, continued to demonstrate the results of the development and maintenance of the policyholders' habits of thrift and the fulfilment of the desire for income funds to be payable at the beginning of periods of advanced age. In the record of death claims were many accident cases. The death claims due to the Lusitania disaster will appear in the record of 1915 to the amount of more than $1,300,000 of life and accident insurance. In the course of the compilation of life insurance payments in 1914 the names of women appeared frequently. A notable payment was for $65,000. Unmarried women are considered excellent risks. The largest claim paid last year was on the policy that had been held by George W. Vanderbilt, whose residence was in Washington. The policy was for $1,000,000. The company that issued it reinsured $750,000 of the face amount. Within an hour after the presentation of the proofs of death a cheque for $1,000,000 to the order of Edith S. Vanderbilt, executrix, was signed and delivered. Mr. Vanderbilt carried the policy on the twenty-payment life plan seventeen years. During that period he paid premiums to the amount of $[illegible]5,000.

The largest single claim in 1914, paid in Toronto, was $326,260. In Hamilton the payments amounted to $180,500. One Hamilton payment amounted to $13,397.

EDITORIAL NOTES

Elihu Root will not likely get much German support in his next candidature for office.

Mr. Meighen holds the threat of an election over the Liberals. But that does not scare them.

We hope that the Kaiser will carefully read the evidence taken at the Lusitania investigation.

What excuse has Germany for sinking so many Norwegian vessels? Has Germany one policy for her and another for the States?

The Toronto Methodist Conference does not think much of the Hearst Government's temperance reform. They are disappointing.

The Kaiser is quite grieved and indignant over the killing of the "poor innocent victims" of the beloved Karlsruhe, but he still [illegible] at the slaughter of British babies.

Men who believe in tampering with election ballots should make a mark at the place where that Lincoln county deputy returning officer was fined $1,000 for altering a ballot paper.

When Britain can spend $15,000,000 a day on the war, what nonsense it must have been to declare that she could not afford to pay for Lloyd-George's old age pension and other schemes.

Mr. W. F. Garland, M. P. for Carleton County, who was read out of the Tory party by the Premier, has made an appeal to the Conservative Association of the county for renomination. This appeal is accompanied by the following veiled threat: "Weigh these facts well in your mind before deciding to vote against me in convention. I still hold the patronage of the county." What you can get out of politics seems to be his rule of life.

The marking of the boundary line between Canada and the States will be completed in a year or two. The survey has completed about 2,200 miles of the boundary line between the United States and Canada and from the Pacific Ocean to the western end of Rainy Lake, in northern Minnesota, the boundary has been monumented. The commission that is making the boundary surveys is composed of Canadians and Americans, and the members are working together in a spirit of close co-operation.

The shops of the Grand Trunk at Montreal and Stratford are turning out shells at the rate of 400 per day in each place. This is considered a good record, when it is taken into account that the shops were not fitted up for any such work; that the machinery had to be modified, and that the work had to be done concurrently with important repairs and reconstructing work, for which the shops are noted. The C. P. R., in the Angus shops, is turning out something like 10,000 per month; but, of course, the shops are constructed on a gigantic scale, while the machines were numerous and easily adaptable to the new purposes.

The Buffalo Express, in commenting on the fact that the American liner, the St. Paul, was convoyed by British destroyers until she was well past the supposed danger zone of the Irish Sea, said:

The thought of an American ship abandoning the protection of her neutral flag and her neutral government and accepting, instead, the convoy of warships of a belligerent power must arouse a feeling of both shame and indignation in patriotic minds. If American merchant ships need protection, the United States navy should furnish it. The sting of the incident, however, lies in the fact that American ships in the waters around the British Isles unquestionably do need armed protection and have needed it ever since February 18. That was a very notable courtesy, but the United States had no right to accept it, so long as it has a navy of its own lying idle in home ports, nor has Great Britain the right to repeat it while so many of her own ships and seamen are perishing daily for lack of similar convoy.

Captains of vessels which arrive from Britain at Montreal say that very few persons understand how complete are the arrangements by which the British Admiralty keeps German submarines moving, and warns incoming and outgoing steamers of how to avoid them. Yet it is due in great part to these precautions that the submarine blockade proclaimed by Germany has proved non-effective. The submarines have been practically banished from the English and Irish Channels, say several captains, and every day new devices for getting after submarines are put into effect, but are kept secret from the enemy. It is believed by many masters who are acquainted with navy officers that preparations for operations on a huge scale against the submarines have been brought into a state of effectiveness which will make existence anywhere within a hundred miles of the British Isles very uncertain for any submarine attempting it. The further from land the less chance of success for the submarine even to find British or neutral vessels.

THAT MEDICINE BOX.

What to Put in it for Use Upon Occasion.

An eight-ounce can of carbonized vaseline, for cuts, burns, chapping and skin diseases.

A small bottle of carbolic acid, used as a disinfectant.

A small tin of bicarbonate of soda for burns.

A small can of ground mustard for plasters, and an emetic in case of poisoning.

A bottle of tincture of Jamaica ginger for colic and stomach relief.

A bottle of castor oil. Cathartic.

A bottle of turpentine. Useful mixed with lard as a rubifacient.

A bottle of camphor, to satisfy the old ladies.

A mixture of glycerine and bay rum with ten drops of carbolic added to each two ounces.

A small bottle of arnica, to rub on the skin.

A small bottle of glycerine, or what is better—

A hot water bag.

A fountain syringe.

A small, hard rubber syringe to be used in earaches, for hot water, and to inject antiseptics into deep wounds.

A spool of surgeon's adhesive plaster an inch wide.

A pound package of absorbent cotton. Its uses are endless on the farm.

Six rolls of bandages from one to three inches wide.

A clinical, self-registering thermometer. In these days of telephones it may save a visit from the doctor.

A bottle of peroxide of hydrogen for fresh wounds, a mouth wash, etc.

THE Changeling

To these queries the clerk replied that he believed Mr. Douglas had gone to Boston on business; that he might be at home that night; at all events, he would probably return in the morning; she could find Mr. Warner, who would tell her all about it. "Shall I send for him?" he continued, as he saw the scowl upon her face.

"Certainly not," she answered, and taking the key, which had been left in his charge, she retired to Theo's rooms, and sinking into a large easy-chair, fanned herself furiously, wondering if they would return that night, and what they would say when they found her there. "But I don't care," she continued, speaking aloud and shaking her head very decidedly by the mirror opposite, and who shook her head as decidedly in return! "George Douglas has deceived us shamefully, and I'll tell him so, too. I wish he'd come this minute!"

But George Douglas knew well what he was doing. Very gradually was he imparting to Theo a knowledge of his parents, and Theo, who really loved her husband, was learning to prize him for himself and not for his family. Feeling certain that the firemen's muster would bring his mother to town, and knowing that Theo was not yet prepared to see her, he was greatly relieved at Madam Conway's sudden departure, and had himself purposely left home, with the intention of staying away until Friday night. This, however, Madam Conway did not know, and very impatiently she awaited his coming, until the lateness of the hour precluded the possibility of his arrival, and she retired to bed, but not to sleep, for the city was full of firemen, and one company, failing of finding lodgings elsewhere, had taken refuge in an empty carriage shop near by. The hard, bare floor was not the most comfortable bed imaginable, and, preferring the bright moonlight and open air, they made the night hideous with their noisy shouts, which the watchmen tried in vain to hush. To sleep in that neighborhood was impossible, and all night long Madam Conway vibrated between her bed and the window, from which latter point she frowned wrathfully down upon the red coats below, who scoffing alike at law and order as dispensed by the police, kept up their noisy revel, shouting lustily for "Chelsea, No. 4," and "Washington, No. 2," until the dawn of day.

"I wish to mercy I'd gone home!" sighed Madam Conway, as weak and faint she crept down to the breakfast table, doing but little justice to anything and returning to her room pale, haggard and weary.

Ere long, however, she became interested in watching the crowds of people, who at an early hour filled the streets, and when at last the different fire companies of the State paraded the town in a seemingly never-ending procession, she forgot in a measure her trouble, and drawing her chair to the window, sat down to enjoy the brilliant scene, involuntarily nodding her head to the stirring music, as troop after troop passed by. Up and down the street, as far as the eye could reach, the sidewalks were crowded with men, women and children, all eager to see the sight. There were people from the city and people from the country, the latter of whom, having anticipated the day for weeks and months, were now unquestionably enjoying it.

Conspicuous among these was a middle-aged woman who elicited remarks from all who beheld her, both from the peculiarity of her dress and the huge blue cotton umbrella she persisted in hoisting, to the great annoyance of those in whose faces it was thrust, and who forgot in a measure their vexation when they read the novel device it bore. Like many other people who can sympathize with the good woman, she was always losing her umbrella, and at last, in self-defence, had embroidered upon the blue in letters of white:

"Steal me not for fear of shame,
For here you see the owner's name,
"Charity Douglas."

As the lettering was small and not very distinct, it required a close observation to decipher it; but the plan was a successful one, nevertheless, and for four long years the blue umbrella had done good service to its mistress, shielding her alike from sunshine and from storm, and now in the crowded city it performed a double part, preventing its nearest neighbor from seeing, while at the same time it kept the dust from settling on the thick green veil and leghorn bonnet of its owner. At Betsey Jane's suggestion she wore a hoop to-day on Theo's account, and that she was painfully conscious of the fact was proved by the many anxious glances she cast at her chocolate-colored muslin, through the thin folds of which it was plainly visible.

"I wish I had left the pesky thing to hum," she thought, feeling greatly relieved when at last, as the crowd became greater, it was broken in several pieces and ceased to do its duty.

From her seat near the window Madam Conway caught sight of the umbrella as it swayed up and down amid the multitude, but she had no suspicion that she who bore it thus aloft had even a better right herself to sit where she was sitting. In her excitement she had forgotten Mrs. Douglas' intended visit, to prepare Theo for which she had returned to Worcester, but it came to her at length, when, as the last fire company passed, the blue umbrella was closed, and the leghorn bonnet turned in the direction of the hotel. There was no mistaking the broad, good-humored face which looked so eagerly up at "George's window," and involuntarily Madam Conway glanced under the bed with the view of fleeing thither for refuge!

"What shall I do?" she cried, as she heard the umbrella on the stairs. "I'll lock her out," she continued; and in an instant the key was in her pocket, while, trembling in every limb, she awaited the result.

Nearer and nearer the footsteps came; there was a knock upon the door, succeeded by a louder one, and then, as both these failed to elicit a response, the handle of the umbrella was vigorously applied. But all in vain, and Madam Conway heard the discomfited outsider say, "They told me Theodosy's grandmarm was here, but I guess she's in the street. I'll come agin bime-by," and Mrs. Douglas, senior, walked disconsolately down the stairs, while Madam Conway thought it doubtful whether she gained access to the room that day, come as often as she might.

Not long after the gong sounded for dinner, and unlocking the door, Madam Conway was about descending to the dining-room, when the thought burst upon her, "What if she should be at the table? It is just like her."

The very idea was overwhelming, taking from her at once all desire for dinner; and returning to her room, she tried, by looking over the books, and examining the carpet, to forget how hungry and faint she was. Whether she would have succeeded is doubtful, had not an hour or two later brought another knock from the umbrella, and driven all thoughts of eating from her mind. In grim silence she waited until her tormentor was gone, and then wondering if it was not time for the train, she consulted her watch. But alas! 'twas only four; the cars did not leave until six, and so another weary hour went by. At the end of that time, however, thinking the depot preferable to being a prisoner there she resolved to go; and leaving the key with the clerk, she called a carriage and was soon on her way to the cars.

As she approached the depot she observed an immense crowd of people gathered together, among which the red coats of the firemen were conspicuous. A fight was evidently in progress, and, as the horses began to grow restless, she begged of the driver to let her alight, saying she could easily walk the remainder of the way. Scarcely, however, was she on terra firma when the yelling crowd made a precipitate rush toward her, and in such alarm she climbed for safety into an empty buggy, whereupon the horse, equally alarmed, began to rear, and without pausing an instant, the terrified lady sprang out on the side opposite to that by which she had entered, catching her dress upon the seat, and tearing out the gathers from the waist.

"Heaven help me!" she cried, picking herself up and beginning to wish she had never troubled herself with Theo's mother-in-law.

To reach the depot was now her great object, and as the two belligerent parties occupied the front, she thought to effect an entrance at the rear. But the door was locked, and as she turned the corner of the building she suddenly found herself in the thickest of the fight. To advance was impossible, to turn back equally so, and while meditating some means of escape she lost her footing and fell across a wheelbarrow which stood upon the platform, crumpling her bonnet and scratching her face upon a nail which protruded from the vehicle. Nearer dead than alive, she made her way at last into the depot, and from thence into the cars, where, sinking into a seat, and drawing her shawl closely around her, the better to conceal the sad condition of her dress, she indulged in meditations not wholly complimentary to firemen in general, and her late comrades in particular.

For half an hour she waited impatiently, but though the cars were filling rapidly, there were no indications of starting; and it was almost seven ere the long and heavily loaded train moved slowly from the depot. About fifteen minutes previous to their departure as Madam Conway was looking ruefully out upon the multitude, she was horrified at seeing, directly beneath her window, the veritable woman from whom, through the entire day, she had been hiding. Involuntarily she glanced at the vacant seat in front of her, which, as she feared, was soon occupied by Mrs. Douglas and her companion, who, as Madam Conway divined, was "Sam Babbit's wife."

Trembling nervously lest she should be discovered, she drew her veil closely over her face, keeping very quiet, and looking intently from the window into the gathering darkness without. But her fears were groundless, for Mrs. Douglas had no suspicion that the crumpled bonnet and sorry figure sitting so disconsolately in the corner was the same which but the day before had honored her with a call. She was in high spirits, having had, as she informed her neighbor, "a tip-top time." On one point, however, she was disappointed. "She meant as much as could be to have seen Theodosy, but she wan't to hum. Her grandmarm was in town," said she, "but if she was in the room she must have been asleep, or dreadful deaf, for I pounded with all my might. I'm sorry, for I'd like to scrape acquaintance with her, bein' we're connected."

An audible groan came from beneath the thick brown veil, whereupon both ladies turned their heads. But the indignant woman made no sign, and in a whisper loud enough for Madam Conway to hear, Mrs. Douglas said, "Some Irish critter in liquor, I presume. Look at her jammed bonnet."

This remark drew from Mrs. Babbit a very close inspection of the veiled figure, who, smothering her wrath, felt greatly relieved when the train started and prevented her from hearing anything more. At the next station, however, Mrs. Douglas showed her companion a crochet collar, which she had purchased for two shillings, and which, she said, "was almost exactly like the one worn by the woman who stopped at her house the day before."

Leaning forward, Madam Conway glanced contemptuously at the coarse knit thing, which bore about the same resemblance to her own handsome collar as cambric does to satin.

"Vulgar, ignorant creatures!" she muttered, while Mrs. Babbit, after duly praising the collar, proceeded to make some inquiries concerning the strange lady who had shared Mrs. Douglas' hospitality.

"I've no idea who she was," said Mrs. Douglas, "but I think it's porty likely she was some crazy critter they was takin' to the hospital."

Another groan from beneath the brown veil, and turning around, the kind-hearted Mrs. Douglas asked if she was sick, adding in an aside, as there came no answer, "Been fightin' I'll warrant!"

Fortunately for Madam Conway, the cars moved on, and when they stopped again, to her great relief, the owner of the blue umbrella, together with "Sam Babbit's wife," alighted, and amid the crowd assembled on the platform she recognized Betsey Jane, who had come down to meet her mother. The remainder of the way seemed tedious enough, for the train moved but slowly, and it was near ten o'clock ere they reached the Hillsdale station, where, to her great delight, Madam Conway found Margaret awaiting her, together with Arthur Carrollton. The moment she saw the former, who came eagerly forward to meet her, the weary, worn-out woman burst into tears; but at the sight of Mr. Carrollton she forced them back, saying in reply to Maggie's inquiries that Theo was not at home; that she had spent a dreadful day, and been knocked down in a fight at the depot, in proof of which she pointed to her torn dress, her crumpled bonnet, and scratched face. Maggie laughed aloud in spite of herself, and though Mr. Carrollton's eyes were several times turned reprovingly upon her, she continued to laugh at intervals at the sorry, forlorn appearance presented by her grandmother, who for several days was confined to her bed from the combined effects of fasting, fright, firemen's muster, and her late encounter with Mrs. Douglas, senior!

CHAPTER XV.

Mr. Carrollton had returned from Boston on Thursday afternoon, and finding them all gone from the hotel, had come on to Hillsdale in the evening train, surprising Maggie as she sat in the parlor alone, wishing herself in Worcester, or in some other place where it was not as lonely as there. With his presence the loneliness disappeared, and in making his tea and in listening to his agreeable conversation, she forgot everything, until, observing that she looked very weary, he said, "Maggie, I would willingly talk to you all night, were it not for the bad effects it would have on you to-morrow. You must go to bed now," and he showed her his watch, which pointed to the hour of midnight.

Exceedingly mortified, Maggie was leaving the room, when, noticing her evident chagrin, Mr. Carrollton came to her side and, laying his hand very respectfully on hers, said kindly, "It is my fault, Maggie, keeping you up so late, and I only send you away now, because those eyes are growing heavy, and I know that you need rest. Good-night to you, and pleasant dreams."

He went with her to the door, watching her until she disappeared up the stairs; then half wishing he had not sent her from him, he, too, sought his chamber; but not to sleep, for Maggie, though absent, was with him still in fancy. For more than a year he had been haunted with a bright, sunshiny face, whose owner embodied the dashing, independent spirit, and softer qualities which made Maggie Miller so attractive. Of this face he had often thought, wondering if the real would equal the ideal, and now that he had met with her, had looked into her truthful eyes, had gazed upon her sunny face, which mirrored faithfully her every thought and feeling, he was more than satisfied, and to love that beautiful girl seemed to him an easy matter. She was so childlike, so artless, so different from any whom he had ever known, that he was interested in her at once. But Arthur Carrollton never did a thing precipitately. She might have many glaring faults, he must see her more, must know her better, ere he lavished upon her the love whose deep fountains had never yet been stirred.

After this manner he reasoned as he walked up and down his chamber, while Maggie, on her sleepless pillow, was thinking, too, of him, wondering if she did hate him as much as she intended, and if Henry would be offended at her sitting up with him until after 12 o'clock.

It was nearly half-past nine when Maggie awoke next morning, and making a hasty toilet, she descended to the dining-room, where she found Mr. Carrollton awaiting her. He had been up a long time; but when Anna Jeffrey, blessed with an uncommon appetite, fretted at the delay of breakfast, and suggested calling Margaret, he objected, saying she needed rest, and must not be disturbed. So, in something of a pet, the young lady breakfasted alone with her aunt, Mr. Carrollton preferring to wait for Maggie.

"I am sorry I kept you waiting," said Maggie, seating herself at the table and continuing to apologize for her tardiness.

But Mr. Carrollton felt more than repaid by having her thus alone with him, and many were the admiring glances he cast toward her, as with her shining hair, her happy face, her tasteful morning gown of pink, and her beautiful white hands, which handled so gracefully the silver coffee-urn, she made a living, glowing picture, such as any man might delight to look upon. Breakfast being over, Mr. Carrollton proposed a ride, and as Anna Jeffrey at that moment entered the parlor, he invited her to accompany them. There was a shadow on Maggie's brow, as she left the room to dress, a shadow which had not wholly disappeared when she returned; and observing this, Mr. Carrollton said: "Were I to consult my own wishes, Maggie, I should leave Miss Jeffrey at home; but she is a poor girl, whose enjoyments are far less than ours, consequently I invited her for this once, knowing how fond she is of riding."

"How thoughtful you are of other people's happiness!" said Maggie, the shadow leaving her brow at once.

"I am glad that wrinkle has gone, at all events," returned Mr. Carrollton, laughing, and laying his hand upon her forehead, he continued: "Were you my sister Helen I should probably kiss you for having so soon got over your pet, but as you are Maggie Miller, I dare not," and he looked earnestly at her, to see if he had spoken the truth.

Coloring crimson as it became the affianced bride of Henry Warner to do, Maggie turned away, thinking Helen must be a happy girl, and half wishing she, too, were Arthur Carrollton's sister. It was a long delightful excursion they took, and Maggie, when she saw how Anna Jeffrey enjoyed it, did not altogether regret her presence. On their way home she proposed calling upon Hagar, "whom she had not seen for three whole days."

"And who, pray, is Hagar?" asked Mr. Carrollton; and Maggie replied, "She is my old nurse, a strange, crazy creature whom they say I somewhat resemble."

By this time they were near the cottage, in the door of which old Hagar was standing, with her white hair falling round her face.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON I. July 4, 1915.

Absalom's Failure. 2 Samuel 18: 1-15.

COMMENTARY.—I. David's tenderness toward Absalom (vs. 1-5). 1. David numbered—He mustered and reviewed his troops. We are not told how many he had in his army. Josephus places the number at four thousand. 2. A third part—David divided his men into three companies that he might succeed in dividing the forces of the enemy. Joab—He was the ablest general of his time and a man upon whom David relied in the campaign. David was himself a warrior, and even if his army was smaller than Absalom's, he had great military leaders, and trained soldiers. I will surely go forth with you—He purposed to take the chief command in the engagement. 3. Thou shalt not go forth—So much depending on the life of the king, he was not allowed to take the field in person.—J. F. & B. If the king should be slain, Absalom's end would be accomplished. That thou succour us."—R. V. If David should remain in the city of Mahanaim, he would be able to send reinforcements wherever they might be needed. 4. What seemeth you best I will do—The king was inclined to yield to the wishes and judgment of his people. 5. Deal gently for my sake with Absalom—It was David's deep affection for the beautiful youth, which, notwithstanding all his errors, still yearned for him. The tenderness of the father exceeded the justice of the king.—Whedon. David was the father of this worthless young man, and is it to be wondered at that he feels as a father? Who, in this circumstances, that had such feelings as every man should have, would have felt or acted otherwise?—Clarke. Some think that David desired that Absalom should be spared to repent of his wicked deeds. All the people heard—The entire army knew the king's feelings toward his rebellious son and knew that he wished no harm to come to him.

II. The battle in the forest (vs. 6-8). 6. The people—The supporters of David. Against Israel—The followers of Absalom—It was in reality one faction of Israel against another. Here is an indication of the line of cleavage between Israel and Judah. The wood of Ephraim—The exact location of this forest is not known, but it was probably not far from the Mahanaim toward the Jordan. 7. The people of Israel were slain—Since twenty thousand of Absalom's men fell in the battle, we conclude that he must have had an immense army in comparison with that of David. Evidently the Lord undertook for the king and gave him a decided victory over the rebellious army. 8. The battle was there scattered—The surface of the country was such that the army could not well keep together and David's men were separated into three divisions. The wood devoured more people than the sword—The explanation generally given is that they perished in the pits and precipices and morasses of the forest; but this seems unlikely. More probably it means that, owing to the nature of the ground more were slain in the pursuit through the forest, than in the actual battle.

III. Absalom is slain (vs. 9-15). 9. Absalom met the servants of David—Absalom in flight found himself among his enemies and hastened to escape from them. Head caught hold of the oak—As he rode among the low spreading trees of the forest, his head caught in the fork of a branch and, his mule passing on, left him there suspended. Many suppose that, since his hair was exceedingly heavy (ch. 14. 26), it was caught in the branches. 10. A certain man....told Joab—The man would not disobey the king's orders by killing Absalom, and therefore took the news directly to Joab. Hanged in an oak—Absalom's condition was a desperate one. His army was defeated and badly demoralized, and he was struggling to free himself from the boughs by which, without human agency, he was held fast. 11. Ten shekels of silver—The shekel was about a half ounce in weight, and its value varied. The ten shekels would be equivalent to two or three dollars. A girdle—This was worn to hold the loose clothing about the waist, and was often of expensive workmanship. 12. Against the king's son—The man was loyal to David. 13. Against mine own life—It was not simply respect for the king that kept him from touching Absalom, for by doing so he would have incurred the king's displeasure and would probably have lost his life. Joab might have taken a position with the king against him. 14. Thrust them through the heart of Absalom—Joab acted contrary to the king's express orders, but he was shrewd enough to see that David would not be secure in his kingdom while Absalom was alive, therefore he took the responsibility of taking his life. 15. Ten young men—These armor-bearers accompanied Joab wherever he went. Slew him—If Joab's darts pierced Absalom's heart, he was dead already, and the young men inflicted wounds upon his lifeless body.

Questions.—Who was Absalom? What course did he take to obtain the kingdom? How and where was he proclaimed king? What course did David take while Absalom marched toward Jerusalem? How did Absalom's army compare in size with that of David? What directions did David give his army regarding Absalom? Describe the battle and the results.

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Rebellion by intrigue.

I. Openly declared, justly punished.
II. Heroically met and vanquished.

I. Openly declared, justly punished. This lesson is a narrative of that fatal contest where Absalom fought against his father David for the throne of Israel. It relates one of the saddest tragedies in human history. Absalom knowingly pledged himself to his father's ruin. His last purpose was to deprive his father of his throne, his happiness, and even his life, if necessary to obtain that purpose. David had no greater enemy in Israel. Absalom had ceased to be a son in the essential sense of the word. His endeavors to live without his father's fellowship and blessing seemed most successful. Lost love was succeeded by antagonism. Wise and astute men encouraged and helped him. Forces were placed at his disposal. The aim of his ambition seemed to be within reach when he found his forces scattered by an opposing force, the strength of which he did not expect to meet. Absalom learned emphatically that the authority despised had to be dealt with. After a long course of persistent wickedness Absalom met his doom. He met David's soldiers. Although they spared him and gave him opportunity to escape, according to David's request, divine vengeance would not spare him. The instruments of his death were least thought of in battle. His inanimate tree and his trusted animal, together formed the mode of his execution. None of his companions in crime remained with him to release him from his torture, but left him to his fate, suspended between heaven and earth, a sad spectacle indeed. David, having no personal revenge against his own son, and knowing the character of Joab, he urged upon him as a strong restraint, consideration for himself as king and father. The vital question as to what would have to be done with a captured rebel had not been brought before the king's decision. To the soldier, who brought the report of Absalom's distress, the question of prudence was not considered. Obedience to the royal authority was his prime duty, governing rule of his conduct. No persuasion of a general could turn him from his principle. He was amazed that any one should think of deviating from a command so plain. His spirit was politically and morally sound and pure. Joab swept aside all such forceful pressure because his conduct was governed by the consideration of a policy of expediency. He was a man of deeds when matters were urgent.

Was Constantly Troubled With Boils.

HAD NINE ON HIS ARMS AT ONCE.

Boils are caused by bad blood, and unless the blood is made pure you cannot expect to get rid of them.

Ointments and salves will do you no good. You must get at the seat of the trouble by using a good internal blood purifying medicine such as that grand old remedy Burdock Blood Bitters.

Mr. Samuel Buckler, Tatamagouche, N.S., writes: "Last summer I was constantly troubled with boils. I had nine on my arms at once. I thought it was caused from bad blood so I got two bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters, and before the first bottle was done I began to feel a great deal better, and before the second one was finished I did not have a boil, nor have I had one since. I cannot recommend B.B.B. too highly."

Burdock Blood Bitters is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

II. Heroically met and vindicated. David was challenged to vindicate his own throne. He was obliged to meet the insubordination and the revolt of his own son. He was obliged to care for the kingdom over which he had been appointed by God. The validity of his anointing was still unrevoked by him who ordained it. Duty to himself, his kingdom and his God compelled him to prevent the usurpation attempted. The recollection of such duty aroused courage and resolution. The battle had to be fought out in his own nature before it was transferred to the open field. David suppressed the pain of making war against his own son because it was right to do so, but that did not imply the uprooting from his heart of tenderness, commiseration and yearning sorrow, even for a prodigal son. The emotions of his father heart were kept under by the prompt and energetic application of all his powers of mind and body in the performance of kingly duty. The calm and sober way in which he began to marshal his forces showed that he had come from God to subordinate the anguish of his heart to the sense of duty. He did not waver in his kingly design to subdue rebellion, nor did he show a wicked leniency toward an evil life in his son. He could not but see, in the rebellion, the chastening hand of God, before which it became him in his lifelong penitence, mingled with sincere trust, to bow. David's men offered themselves willingly to his service and readily risked their lives for his sake. They set an inestimable value on his life in comparison to their own. Patriotism and piety required utmost care for his preservation. A general and intense feeling of resentment was naturally felt against Absalom by all except his father, whom he had cruelly wronged.

One of the saddest phases of the human experience is the way a man, just about the time he succeeds in getting his brain developed to the point where he might accomplish something with it, finds that he has to devote all his attention to his teeth, stomach and legs to keep going at all.—Columbus, O., Journal.

HAD CHOLERA INFANTUM.

Doctor Said He was In a Very Dangerous Condition.

Mothers cannot watch their children too closely for signs of cholera infantum as this disease carries off thousands of infants during the hot summer months.

Mrs. Geo. W. Garland, Prosser Brook, N.B., writes: "Last summer my boy Joe, then a year old, was taken sick with cholera infantum. He was so bad the waste matter from the bowels looked as if it had come from a broken boil. I sent word to the doctor who was at a neighbor's, about a mile distant, and he said my boy was in a very dangerous condition. He sent me some tablets which made the child vomit, and when he learned that they caused vomiting he sent me more tablets to stop it. In the meantime I had been giving Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry which I continued using, and when the bottle was all used my baby was cured. I though it only fair to let you know about it."

Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is known from one end of Canada to the other as a positive cure for all bowel complaints.

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" be sure you get what you ask for as there are many rank imitations on the market.

CANADIAN HOSPITAL IN LONDON.

The Queen's Canadian Military Hospital was organized at the commencement of the war by Canadians in London, England, for the special purpose of treating Canadian wounded. Sir William Osler, Bart., F. R. S., as Physician in Chief, and Lieut. Col. Donald Armour, F.R.C.S., Surgeon in Chief; and the hospital is managed by a representative committee of which Mr George McLaren Brown is Chairman. It is beautifully situated at Beachborough Park, which is kindly lent for the purpose by Sir Arthur and Lady Markham. The hospital, which is supported by voluntary contributions of friends in England and Canada is urgently in need of funds and of all kinds of surgical supplies and dressings, especially gauze bandages. Any person desiring to assist the work of the hospital in caring for the Canadian wounded will kindly send funds or supplies to Lieut. Col. Donald Armour, The Queen's Canadian Military Hospital, Beachborough Park, Shorncliffe, England.

WHO IS A CANADIAN.

There is a controversy as to who is a Canadian. One correspondent says that a Canadian is a person born in Canada, whose parents were also born in Canada. But another [illegible] this will not [illegible] [illegible] were born in the United Kingdom [illegible] thing but a Canadian. Many of [illegible] in the British Islands, but they were ranked as Canadians just as are the [illegible] of the present day, most of whom were born in Canada.

The cause of the raising of the question is the very large immigration of the last decade. There are large bodies of new comers whose thoughts and affections are naturally fixed upon their old home and the assimilation between them and native Canadians is not complete; There is a feeling that the natives and the newcomers have interests and sentiments that are not identical. But all this will pass away. It is part of the "growing pains" of a young country.

There is a disposition to forget the really big features of the situation [illegible] for the very reason that [illegible] Canada [illegible] [illegible] Our national [illegible] [illegible] their part in the world's work and in the [illegible] of civilization.

At present we are doing [illegible] thing to preserve the civilization of the world against Prussian barbarism. If, in this conflict, humanity succeeds in maintaining itself [illegible] [illegible] work will still remain to be done in Canada, [illegible] which will be [illegible] for civilization. In this work, just as in the war which interrupts the work, it will be [illegible] to inquire where a man was born. The main thing will be the quality of his work. The present war is waged, so far as we are concerned, [illegible] that the Prussian [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] up to the highest possible point [illegible] There will be [illegible] between nations, but it will be [illegible] by intelligent means. In this rivalry, all [illegible] Canadians [illegible] [illegible] does not matter [illegible] born, or how long they have [illegible]

Strange Disappearance

Great anxiety is felt regarding the whereabouts of Duncan Graham, of Ninth Ave. E., who mysteriously disappeared from his home on Saturday evening and has not been seen since. He is about nineteen years of age and is a son of Mr. John Graham of Ninth Ave. E., [illegible] malleable Iron Works. On Sunday forenoon between nine and ten o'clock he set out to go to a [illegible] Mr. Conte[illegible], east of the [illegible] works. These are the days when the cry is not heard throughout the land [illegible] of Israel go through the city collecting up the [illegible] and [illegible] which [illegible] off every year in each household. It is a wonderful collection he gathers [illegible] to his [illegible] rather bag. That which the [illegible] becomes the prized [illegible] of the gathers' collection. He realizes the value of small things. A few things regarded as useless by a man here and another there so establish themselves as a source of wealth [illegible] peddler. It is a mystery what [illegible] all these odds and ends, but that they are profitable is demonstrated by the fact that so many men are making a living out of gathering just such articles. The yards of the dealers are piled high with them—it is their harvest. This unusual collection reminds one of the old saying, "Take care of the pennies, and the pounds will look after themselves."

Left for Scotland.

J. M. Fairlie, editor of the Wiarton Record, has resigned and left last week for Scotland where he will [illegible] the 8th Battalion of Princess Louise's Own Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders as a captain. In his Au Revoir last week, Editor Fairlie in part said:—Should time and circumstances permit after I reach the firing line I shall give the Record readers any information and if peace finds me still alive I shall most assuredly return to renew old acquaintances. But if the fates [illegible] decide otherwise and I find a last resting place in some trench where so many of my compatriots have fallen, then my only wish is that the returning heroes [illegible] one who "did his bit."

Give Half Road

Now that motor cars have become so common most horses have become pretty well used to them. Formerly a man with a team could not get out of the way quickly enough when overtaken by a car. He would turn up a side road or jump a ditch with great celerity. Now, in many cases, he is said to be quite slow in making way for the car to get by and seems to take delight in crowding the auto over near the ditch as possible or in delaying it. Some foolish motorists on the other hand, seem to try and aggravate the drivers of horses. This is wrong on both sides. There should be a sensible observance of the rules of the road by all. Do as you would be done by. Keep to the right when meeting or letting by another vehicle. When trying to get by a conveyance going in the same direction, turn to the left. Where the passing is bad slow up, or if you can't do that, stop altogether. Be glad to let by another person who desires to get ahead. Let the one who passes get well ahead and not give the person passed his dust.

All About a Dog

There was a large crowd of people here from Brant Tp., on Friday, all interested in a dispute about the ownership of a dog. Out of that dispute several charges have arisen. To Oil Street.

A deputation of business men waited on the Council on Monday, asking the co-operation of our township fathers in the experiment of oiling our streets in the main business section of the town. A subscription list will be circulated to buy a number of barrels of oil, and if the first application proves satisfactory, all the streets in this village will be oiled next spring.—Mildmay Gazette.

Mail Boxes Dangerous

It will not be long before the rural mail boxes will have to be moved to conform to a system which will have greater safety than at present. Last week a gentleman riding in his auto was killed through a collision with a mail box. On many roads two and three boxes close together make it very dangerous proceeding to pass at night, and if by accident the rod is left sticking out on the boxes someone is sure to be killed. In plenty of cases these boxes are at a safe distance, and the authorities should see that all are placed off the road sufficiently to ensure safety.—Port Elgin Times.

Auto Overturned.

Mr. J. H. Wismer, of Port Elgin, had another thrilling experience while motoring through Paisley on Saturday morning. He was accompanied by Mrs. Wismer, their daughter and granddaughter. Descending the first hill south of the station the auto left the road, following a furrow to the ditch, and turned turtle. But for Mr. Wismer's promptness in shutting off his power and applying the brake there would most probably be a very different story to tell of the fate of the occupants. As it was, they were all imprisoned beneath the car until released by Mr. Thede, also of Port Elgin, who with his family was going with the Wismers to Cayuga. The ladies made no outcry, and when they were all extricated from the wreck it was found that happily no one was injured. The car came through with only the top and wind shield broken, and was in good order again as soon as a team of horses could be procured to turn it right side up. The party all returned home again, the Wismer ladies going by train while Mr. Wismer drove the car himself.—Paisley Advocate.

Write to Your Soldier Friends.

In almost every letter received from our soldier boys at the front is the appeal to write to them often and from the wounded lying in the hospitals, the same appeal comes, to send them letters and papers. Far from home and kindred and in alien lands, these brave fellows on the battle front are very lonely and they are depending on the folks at home to keep them in touch with the news of the old home town. Eagerly they look for the mail day by day and every letter they send home contains the same request. "Write to me often whether you hear from me or not." The men lying wounded in the hospitals, surrounded by strangers, have no opportunity of getting papers and letters, except those that are sent them by their friends. This is one way in which the people at home can help to brighten the lives of the men who are fighting and bleeding for us at the front. Almost everyone has a relative or a friend with the troops and it is a duty those at home owe them to send letters and papers just as often as they can. A letter is always welcome to a soldier, so write to your soldier friends and tell them all you know about things that will interest them.

Gentle Reminders

When you go to the picture show do not talk out loud; it annoys others. Ladies remove your hats so others may see; do not sit on the outer seat of your row—others are coming; gentlemen will not, others should not use tobacco in any form while at the show; do not make suggestions aloud about the pictures; they are there to look at only.

Far From Beaten.

The Kaiser in a circular to his troops says that God and gas are on his side and that the enemies of the German Empire will soon be in the dust. He also points out that the aim of Germany is power and domination of all Europe, and nothing is to stop him from complete and final victory. Apparently Germany is, according to the Kaiser, far from beaten.

Going to be Plentiful.

All the outcry about the Niagara peach crop being ruined by the frost was without foundation and we are now told that the crop from present indications is likely to be one of the largest ever harvested. This is good news for it means with proper methods of distribution, cheap peaches for all of us, and next to the Canadian apples Canadian peaches, most of which come from the Niagara district, though Essex and Lambton now furnish a goodly share, should be the most prized of our Canadian fruits.

Hotels Hard Hit.

War time is no harvest for Toronto hotels. It has been stated that an enormous drop in the revenue of the bars has taken place. In some cases the difference has been as great as over 50 per cent. for a single day. The hotel business is no longer the "good thing" it was in times of peace and plenty. Five hotels have recently gotten into financial difficulties since the war started. The last to be reported is the Daly House. Others which preceded it were the Palmer House, which closed entirely; Dunning's, the Woodbine and the Arlington. It is also reported that two other licensed places in the congested district are finding the going exceptionally hard.

London's Popular Exhibition.

The management of the Western Fair of London, Ontario, is very busy arranging for the big Exhibition which takes place this year September 10th to 18th. On account of the Military Authorities using the Grounds and Buildings during the winter, a large amount of work is necessary to be done, but the Board of Directors were only too glad to be able to help in any way in these war times. The new steel Grand Stand is in course of erection, and will be completed in good time. It is 400 feet long by 80 feet wide and will seat 4,000 people, every sitting being a good one. It is of steel construction on cement footings, and absolute safety to the public was the first thing considered in its erection. There will be three twenty foot entrances through the Grand Stand to the paddock in front. A certain number of sittings will be in the reserved section at 50c. and the balance will be the same price as other years 25c. There will be an excellent programme of attractions. Prize lists, entry forms and all information supplied by writing the secretary, A. M. Hunt, London, Ontario.

Canada Temperance in Perth

Perth has spoken and by quite a substantial majority declared itself in favor of no license. The Canada Temperance Act carried by a majority which official figures placed at 201. As a result of the vote some 31 [illegible] and a half a dozen shops will be closed throughout the county within a year. The vote was heavy in all districts as was expected. South Easthope, Logan and Ellice went almost solid against the measure and among them rolled up a vote only 201 less than the other municipalities. The majority against the measure in Ellice was 366, in Logan 222, in Southope 155. Fullarton, Downie and Blanchard, all of whom had been under no license, gave big majorities for the measure, while Elma, an other local option township, also gave a fair favorable majority. Milverton, however, was a surprise. In place of a large majority for the wets, as was expected, the temperance forces won by 29. Much credit for this is given Dr. J. L. Gordon the Winnipeg orator who recently conducted a campaign there. Stratford being a city is not affected by today's vote but there is talk of bringing on a local option campaign in the city. The following are the figures available to-night:

Is as true a mark of quality as the Sterling mark on silver

The making of a Columbia Record is an artistic triumph.

Every shade of a vocal expression and every variation in tone is faithfully recorded and reproduced.

The same holds true in reproducing instrumental music.

In the records of such famous selections as Tschaikowsky's Overture 1812, one can distinguish the notes of every instrument at any moment, even in the most tremendous passages.

Get this Demonstration Disc at 30c

In order that you may become better acquainted with the qualities of Columbia Records, we have issued a Demonstration Record at 30c. This record is typical of the thousands of records in our general catalogues and demonstrates to what a degree of perfection the Columbia Graphophone Co. has brought the art of reproducing vocal and instrumental music.

We will gladly play this and any other Columbia Record for you

HELPING THE SHOPMEN.

The war is exercising a decidedly democratic influence on the manners, customs and habits of English folk, who are commonly regarded as belonging to the big "S" section of society. Before the war it was considered most undignified for anybody with any pretensions to gentility to be seen carrying a parcel in public. But now even dukes and duchesses, to say nothing of "honorables" and untitled respectabilities, may be seen openly and unashamed carrying parcels in Piccadilly or Regent street, with an air which implies the proud consciousness that they are setting a good example.

They are, in fact, responding to an appeal to shoppers which has been issued by the Home Office, through its Distributing Trade Committee. The shoppers were requested:

"To shop early.

"Not to expect immediate service.

"To carry home parcels.

"To give more time for the execution of orders."

The reason for this appeal is that so many shop assistants have abandoned service behind the counter to serve their country in the field, that all the big shops are short-handed and have had to take on a lot of untrained help.

LUCKY COAL MINERS.

The biggest increase in wages ever granted in any of the coal mining districts of Great Britain has just been awarded to the 300,000 miners employed in the districts presided over by the Coal Conciliation Board for England and North Wales.

The award gives an advance of 15-1-2 per cent. from May 5th on the actual wages earned by the men on that date. This is equivalent to an advance of 25 per cent. on the so-called standard fixed under the Minimum Wage Act.

A colliery owner testified at the last meeting of the board that many of his men were earning $7 a day under the old standard. It is expected that the granting of this latest advance will greatly stimulate production, as the narrow margin of coal on hand is causing the Government much anxiety. The Conciliation Board, in granting the increase, added the following statement:

"The board strongly urges all miners' associations to take such steps as, in their judgment, are needful to ensure the fullest possible attendance at their work of all workmen in the federated area."

REGAINED HIS SPEECH.

When he found that speech, which had been lost through concussion, had returned to him, Private Pointer, of the London Rifles, spent a whole night in the general hospital at London talking to himself. He feared to lose it if he did not want to keep it up, yet he did not want to call to the night sister, for fear she might faint. So he waited until the attendant came around with his morning cup of tea, then remarked "Shove it down there, old chap." For this he was showered with the tea by the agitated attendant.

Pointer's case has been of intense interest in the hospital, as a case of loss of speech, taste and hearing, due to the explosion of a giant shell near him in the battle line. He now seems to be recovering his hearing also.

THE KING'S SILVER.

Many beautiful and valuable specimens of antique silver have been contributed by the king to the exhibition held at Messrs. Garrard's rooms in Albemarle street in aid of the Red Cross.

One of the pieces is a George III. plate which belonged to Nelson. It is engraved with his arms as well as with the Prince of Wales' garter badge and coronet.

There are also a George II. epergne, dated 1758, and a Queen Anne cup and cover, dated 1705, which was given by Queen Anne to Sir John Leake, captain of the Eagle at the battle of the Hogue. Two pieces are relics of Coronations. One is a large cup and cover presented to Sir Thomas Mundy, Mayor of Oxford, as his fee for performing, in right of his office, the duty of under butler at the Coronation of George III. The other is a pair of Charles II. goblets used at the Coronation banquet of William and Mary.

There are other royal gifts, including those from the Queen, Queen Alexandra, and the Prince of Wales.

STREET OF WAR WIDOWS.

How severely the naval and military losses of the war have already affected some communities in Great Britain is shown by the announcement that at Chatham, a naval base on the lower Thames, there are 180 war widows on one street. Most of them lost their sailor-husbands in the sinking of the Formidable, Hermes and Princess Irene.

NOTES.

The inhabitants of Melbourn, a little village near Royston, Herts, were mourning on Friday week over the charred and still smouldering remains of some 17 cottages and about 20 barns, stables, and outhouses, which had been destroyed by a fire that swept through the village on Thursday. Between 30 and 40 people were rendered homeless.

A shocking double tragedy was discovered at Spalding in the early hours of Wednesday morning week. The victims were Hilda Annie Dring, aged 17 years, single, and Herbert James Hassett, aged 21 years, gasworks stoker, belonging to King's Lynn, and employed at Spalding Gasworks. Both lived with the girl's parents. It was a lover's quarrel ending in murder and suicide.

Frederick Eagle, a blacksmith on the Duchy of Lancaster Estate, Southwest Norfolk, has just joined the Royal Engineers. He is the father of sixteen children, fifteen living. The eldest, still in his teens and the only one old enough to enlist, has joined one of the new armies.

Lance-Corporal Fuller, of Mansfield, Nottingham, who gained the V. C. for capturing fifty Germans at Neuve Chapelle, was escorted to the market-place on Wednesday week by the mayor, where he was presented with an address and a gold watch.

ENGINE ROOM IN A BATTLE

"Clang!"

The bell of the engine-room telegraph rings out loudly and insistently and the engineer glances at it sharply. But smart as has been his action, that of the engine-room artificer has been smarter, and before the words, full speed ahead, pass the engineer's lips, the throttle is half way open.

Ting-aling-aling. This time it is the telephone bell which is clamoring for attention, and a stoker launches himself across the slippery plates at the instrument. He listens for a moment, then:

"Shut down, sir," he reports to the engineer.

That officer repeats the order, and almost immediately the various indicators are telling the four stokeholds to close all water-tight doors.

The battle has commenced.

Let us, as a matter of interest, imagine that we are in the engine-room of a modern dreadnought in action. On each side of us, unobtrusively stowed away in their mahogany brass-bound cases, are the great turbines. Their humming, though we cannot see them, tells the most expert ear the sound as of a million bees in a house. Near each one hovers a grimy stoker, oil can in hand, and his duty is to see that these monster humming tops do not lack for lubrication.

Right in front, on the foremost bulkhead of the engine-room, are the telegraph dials and the telephones, each of which is in connection with the bridge, and under the direct control of the captain. These are the things which tell us how the fight is going, for the keen engineer can read signs and portents in the changes which are rung upon the telegraph dials.

A tremendous thing is the fighting strain. It is bad even up in the great turrets where men play their parts in the grim drama and hurl death and destruction at the foe, but down here, where one does nothing but wait for orders, it is terrible. Every time the big guns fire one can feel the big ship quiver, and one can also hear the thud, thud of the enemy's shells as they strike the ship.

The only man who does not seem to feel the strain is the one who has apparently the least to do, and that is the engineer. He, however, is busily doing mental arithmetic. He knows how many revolutions his screws are doing per minute, and he realizes that as yet she has still a little bit of steam up her sleeve.

He has just received a private hint from the bridge that she's doing all that is necessary at present, that she is holding the enemy and keeping her well within range.

It may be that last half-knot may be asked for, and he is calculating how much speed he will be able to present the captain with when the final effort is asked for. No one knows, but he, and he won't tell.

There seems to be a kind of waiting expression on most of the faces, and if they could tell you what they were all waiting for it would surprise you. Shut up as they are in a small steel box full of machinery, they are not thinking of the chance of an enemy's projectile coming through and killing them, nor are they waiting for death to come to them in some other manner. What they are dreading is that something should go wrong with their beloved engines, something that would prevent their doing their bit in this fight.

They are keeping their listening for the hiss of escaping steam which will tell them of a main steampipe hit and carried away, for the crash that might smash one of the boilers into small pieces, for the rattle of the steering engine as the rudder is blown away and the ship hangs, without a guide, in the balance.

And then, with a sickening sidelong lurch and a rattle of the steering engine, the floor of the engine-room takes on a sickening slant. The ship has made a sudden and acute turn.

The engineer's face turns from a cheery, optimistic red to a fear-stricken sallow green.

"My God!" he mutters. "Submarines!"

Every man in that engine room and every stoker in the stokeholds knows what that sudden and horrible twist means. It means that the ship has commenced a quadrille with death; that under-water craft are seeking to end her life and the fight at the same time.

Hard a port. Hard a starboard. Amidships for a second, then hard over again. The helm seems to be possessed. And at every movement the deck of the engine-room slants this way and that as the giant rudder presses against the water and brings the ship round on her heels, as they say in the navy.

The strained look has gone now. Everyone is eager and anxious to do but one thing, and that is to obey the orders which come down from the bridge as fast as they possibly can be obeyed. The bridge is having an anxious time, but the men in the depths trust it and reckon it is up to dealing with the biggest flotilla of submarines afloat.

Then, while the ship is running all she knows, the unexpected happens. With a louder and more sudden roar than ever, the steering engine rattles over to hard a port. At precisely the same time the telegraph rings, full astern, starboard engine. Full ahead, port. The ship takes a horrible heel as the rudders, two of them, grip her; the port screw slows down perceptibly as it feels the mighty column of water deflected from the rudder and the starboard one hums along smoothly as it feels the reversed turbines thrust.

And, even as they spin round the men can hear the guns putting in good work and blazing away for all they are worth. Ten minutes later the enemy's fleet, or what are left of them, are steaming for harbor again as fast as they can go.—Pearson's.

MEXICAN SWEETS.

Different From Other Nations: But Very Delicious.

Dulces (sweets) sold in the native shops of Mexico are quite different from the French bonbons and popular candies of other countries. Candy factories are not numerous in Mexico, but in every home delicious sweets are made. The softer candies are put up in wooden boxes called "cajetas" and are often served as desserts.

One of the favorite is called "Pinonata" and in Mexico it is made with the nuts of the pinon, a species of pine. If these are not to be had in the markets of other countries, coarsely chopped English walnuts or peanuts may be substituted. The rule for making is as follows: shell about four teacups of pinon nuts and place in a lightly buttered china dish. Boil a cupful of brown sugar with a half cupful of water until the syrup will harden when dropped in cold water. The syrup must not be stirred while boiling, but when taken from the fire it is beaten swiftly a moment and poured over the nuts, stirring until the syrup sets. Each kernel should then be candy coated. The nuts must not be allowed to adhere to each other. They must be spread out on a waxed paper till quite dry, then boxed, after which they will keep for a long time.

Another pinon delicacy is known as "Pinonate." This requires two cupfuls of shelled nuts. Boil three cupfuls of the fine yellow cane sugar that tastes like maple, with one half cupful of sweet cream and a lump of butter the size of an egg. The only care need be stirred while boiling and tested from time to time. When it is done, it can be rolled into a ball like a caramel. Pour in the nuts and a spoonful of vanilla. When it begins to grow smooth from the stirring, it should be poured into a buttered pan to cool and cut into squares.

A sweet much liked is made of fresh cocoanut cut into small squares. These are simmered in a very thick white sugar syrup till clear and then dried till quite stiff in the sun or in a slow oven.

The red and white peppermint wafers sprinkled over it gives the "Dulce de [illegible]" its name. One half pound of grated cocoanut is needed. Put with it a pint of white sugar to boil with a small pint of water or cocoanut milk. Do not stir, but test by gently taking up a drop in a spoon. When it hardens in cold water it is cooked sufficiently. Lift the mixture from the fire and stir briskly until it turns creamy, but not long enough to have it grain. Have the red and white peppermints already sprinkled on the bottom and sides of a buttered dish and pour in the candy. Let it cool over night. It may then be turned out and cut into squares.

Milk candies are especially popular and typical of Mexico. One which bears the name of "Paste de Nogates" is quite good and reliable. Mix a pound and a half of sugar with two pints of sweet milk, strain, mix with one half pound of English walnuts, and boil until done. Take from the fire and stir until thick.

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

In life we have to take risks—that is part of the game. And no one can play his part manfully who is not prepared to do this, when it is reasonable and needful so to do; when the chances of regard or benefit are sufficiently in one's favor; when it would be pusillanimous or cowardly not to face the music. The wealthy travelers on the unfortunate Lusitania doubtless viewed matters in this light—the chances seemed greatly in their favor. And however bitterly we deplore the sad end of so many valuable lives, we cannot but profoundly admire their pluck, and ever regard with the deepest respect their brave constancy and determination not to be frightened out of what they had resolved to do.

But for all that it is unwise and even foolish to take risks that involve no appreciable reward in case of success; and that are easily avoidable. Andre went out to see the North Pole; at the last moment some of his apparatus broke, and the balloon had to go some hundred feet higher than had been intended—a serious matter in such a temperature. He would not pause for the repairs. Consequently he and his comrades were never seen again. That was brave indeed, but at the same time it was utter foolhardiness.

This may seem a long way from the titular subject of our article. But so many burns and scalds are the result of sheer carelessness and neglect—particularly when young children are concerned. People leave them playing about the fire in cold weather without taking the most ordinary common sense precautions that they shall not go near; then comes injury, possibly death. As a student in a hospital I well remember the numbers carried in on a frosty morning, and mostly burnt all over. Although the parents were mostly poor and of the laboring classes, few probably could not have afforded to set up some sort of fire guard—or to have otherwise kept their infants out of harm's way. They need not have taken useless and uncalled-for risks.

THE THREE DEGREES OF A SCALD.

The ordinary injuries produced by scalding fluid or burn, fall into three categories. You have first the trivial one, which we all feel after grasping a hot kettle handle or poker. It smarts and hurts, but the tissues are not at all damaged, and soon recover. You can and even end the pain, if you like, by the old-fashioned plan of holding the part for a few minutes as near the fire as you can bear it—the heat hurts at the time, but speedily "draws out" the smarting sensation.

The second degree of burn or scald is when a blister follows—the outer skin or epidermis is raised above the true skin by effusion of serum. When the blister has appeared, the best plan is to prick it and evacuate the fluid contents; then tear off the loose skin; then dress with lint spread thickly with zinc ointment.

The third degree is when you find the tissues destroyed more or less extensively, and sores, ulcers, actual gangrene follow. Here you have not only the local lesion to deal with, but also the shock to the nervous system, more or less grave, especially if the sufferer happens to be a young child. Also ulceration of the duodenum, the first part of the small intestine, is prone to supervene eventually.

TREATMENT.

I consider the best plan in every case of severe or extensive scald or burn, is to paint the affected part with a solution of nitrate of silver (lunar caustic), of the strength of 10-15 grains to the fluid ounce of distilled water. The application smarts at the time, but diminishes shock, and leaves the tissues in a far better condition for recovery than they would otherwise be; also stops the subsequent pain. It seals up, as it were, the damaged parts against the harmful influence of the air.

The carron-oil, linseed oil, olive oil, etc., you commonly see employed for these lesions dates from the time of our great grandmothers, probably even from one far earlier; and are of a quite grandmotherly character altogether—although their use has been sanctioned by the custom of generations. The best one can say of the numberless greasy preparations in use is that they are innocuous. Otherwise, their effect for good is nil. They neither ease pain, mitigate shock, or lessen after-consequences on the tissues. On the other hand, a favorite remedy with the medical profession some years ago was lint dipped in a saturated water solution of bicarbonate of soda, which would, to a certain extent, act as does the silver-nitrate.

SUNSTROKE.

The descriptions of sunstroke in medical text books are somewhat vague, and rather indicate that other maladies are apt to be included in the definition, e.g., hysteria and the effects of too much alcohol, or even of improper food in a hot climate.

Two varieties of sun or heat-stroke are commonly reckoned. One follows the direct action of the sun's rays, as when a soldier is on a tedious march when the sun is high or when one rashly stands under it with head uncovered. The second is rather heat than sunstroke ("heat apoplexy" it is often called)—may come on at midnight following prolonged exposure to a very high temperature.

Exhaustion and fatigue greatly predispose, and must always be sedulously avoided if possible. There is sudden loss of consciousness, with high fever. Cold water should be immediately dashed upon the head and body, but most upon the former. If it be procurable, an ice bag should be applied to the head and nape of the neck. The patient should be carefully tended in the most cool and airy place available.

A USEFUL EMETIC.

Supposing someone to swallow [illegible] accidentally, or purposely, a poisonous substance, the first thing usually needed is to bring this up again. The safest and at the same time handiest form of emetic is a tablespoonful of mustard and a tablespoonful of common salt in a tumblerful of water. There are plenty of others, such as wine of ipecacuanha; but they are more or less depressing. Whereas, after drinking the above, and voiding the contents of the stomach, the feeling is rather stimulating than otherwise.

Such an emetic dose, taken once daily for a week or so, constitutes valuable medicinal treatment for the rather prevalent malady of jaundice.

ANTIDOTES TO POISONS.

About the most universally applicable form of antidote is white of egg (albumen). I do not know that any special care is needed to exclude the yolk (vitellin), which is pretty much the same composition. The proper thing to do in a hurry under such circumstances—when, for instance you have inadvertently swallowed carbolic acid in mistake for port wine, or have made some similar error—is to rush for eggs, swallow two or three raw, and then have recourse to the above emetic, with plenty of milk to follow.

For oxalic acid, used for cleaning straw hats and removing ink stains—so commonly at hand in the house—chalk or lime scraped from the ceiling is the appropriate antidote.

For arsenic (arsenious acid) dialysed iron is best, but iron in any shape, e.g., iron rust scraped from hinges will do, and next to this magnesia. For corrosive sublimate, the albumen of eggs as above.

For laudanum, the strongest tea or coffee, and every possible means of keeping the patient awake.

For belladonna, an immediate emetic as above, and afterwards strong black coffee.

For aconite, 20-30 drops of tincture of digitalis (foxglove), followed by plenty of stimulants.

Of course, these are only emergency hints, and must not be taken for more. A doctor must always be sent for immediately trouble is found. In the great majority of cases a suicidal attempt is the result of sudden impulse, and the patient, especially if a woman, will give worlds the next moment to retrace the fatal step.

WAS SO WEAK

WOULD HAVE TO STAY IN BED.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills Cured Her.

Mrs. J. Day, 231 John St. South, Hamilton, Ont., writes: "I was so run down with a weak heart that I could not even sweep the floor, nor could I sleep at night. I was so awfully sick sometimes I had to stay in bed all day as I was so weak. I used three and a half boxes of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, and I am a cured woman to-day, and as strong as any one could be, and am doing my own housework, even my own washing.

STEAM MOTIVE POWER.

It Had Been Used Long Before the Time of Watts and Fulton.

The Marquis of Winchester, while imprisoned in the Tower of London in 1656 invented and constructed a perfect steam engine and had it publicly exhibited the same year at Vauxhall in successful operation.

Thirty-four years later, in 1690, Denis Papin added the piston to the marquis' discovery. In 1698 Captain Savary devised and built a steam engine different in many details from those made by Worcester and Papin, and in 1705 Newcomb, Cawley and Savary constructed their celebrated atmospheric engine, which was complete in every detail.

The above array of historical facts notwithstanding, James Watt, who was not born until sixty years after these great men had given the steam engine to the world, enjoys the distinction of being the veritable inventor, originator and author of the most useful contrivance of the present day.

Fulton, who lived and worked in the early part of the nineteenth century, is given the credit of being the man who demonstrated that steam could be applied to navigation—this, too, in face of the well-known historical fact that De Gary propelled a vessel by steam in the harbor of Barcelona in 1543.—St. James' Gazette.

Bead Combinations.

Yellow beads on a black cord, or beads combining green, gold and blue tones on a dull blue cord are very effective, as are amber and jet beads on a yellow cord. Pretty combinations can be made, says the Louisville Herald, and as they are not at all expensive and can be made at home, one can possess a number of them. Some are finished with a silk tassel while others are made from small beads in tassel form, ending at the top with a large bead.

CONSTIPATION

CAN BE CURED.

There Is Nothing To Equal Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills For This Purpose.

Mrs. A. Cumming, Manchester, Ont., writes: "I have been troubled with constipation for over five years, and feel it my duty to let you know that your Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills have cured me. I only used three vials, and I can faithfully say that they have saved me from a large doctor bill."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills regulate the flow of bile to act properly on the bowels, and thus keep them regular. Irregular bowels are the main cause of constipation.

The price of Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills is 25c per vial or 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

THE POULTRY WORLD

A WORD TO BEGINNERS.

Success in poultry is gained only by experience and strict attention to the many small details that play an important part in the business that falls to those who are the keepers. To rear and be the owner of a flock that will be a profit is not hard to learn. One need not be a college graduate, but one must be willing to work and attend not to [illegible], but to the usual details that go toward making a success. Fowls do not have to be pampered, nor do they require waiting on, but they must be fed regularly and must have fresh and cool water to drink. This is a small item to some, but one of the essentials, especially in spring and summer. Because the water fountain is filled does not mean that duty is accomplished, for the fowls will not drink warm water unless forced to any more than the human race. Regular hours of feeding are essential, and good feeding means added profit. The poultry quarters need not be expensive, but they must be roomy enough and properly ventilated, a comfortable home for the fowls to do their best work. The dropping boards need not be cleaned every day, but they should be cleaned at least three times a week, and lice kept down by use of liquid lice killer. Fowls cannot thrive where lice are in large numbers, and they are ever present unless a steady warfare is waged against them.

Avoid cheap stock. A chick is a chicken in the minds of a great number of beginners, and anything under the heading of utility means that they must be the real thing for the supplying of the egg basket in winter time. Yet masquerading under the name of utility may be nothing but culls, and as a rule very cheap stock can be nothing else. The poultry business is no cheaper than any other line of endeavor, and as a rule the difference in price means the difference in quality. It pays to start with fowls that have quality, because if handled properly, they give greater returns, and that is the every poultry keeper naturally wishes. Quality stock must be paid for, and this kind of stock the beginner finally secures in the long run. This could have been avoided and time and money saved in the beginning if this grade of stock had been purchased. The cheap incubator, brooder, eggs for hatching, day-old chicks or stock are false economy at any time. Cheap feeds can be placed under the same heading. Many a chick has been lost by mouldy feed, or retarded in growth by feeds that could not for the price have the proper quantity of grains needed to make the right growth.

It needs no reasoning to tell that the hatching eggs that can be purchased for a few cents above commercial prices cannot be of high grade. The seller could not afford to give the attention that is required in the breeding pen of quality fowls and ship them in proper carriers for but two or three cents above what he could obtain on the open market. Yet in the beginning those starting to make a success in poultry seek the bargain counter and expect the results that possibly they have read about. Men who have for years been improving their flocks could not get the best results if compelled to handle the same kind of cheap stock so many beginners have purchased.

There is plenty of room for improvement even in the best of strains in any variety, and those who really wish to make the most from poultry should start at the top and, if possible, obtain the best that they can afford.

Another cause of failure is starting on too large a scale. It is far better to commence operations with a few and each year increase, learning with each month many things that books on poultry do not teach, than to commence operations on a large scale and, if a failure comes, blame it on the poultry instead of where it really belongs, on the keeper of the fowls. No one ever gleaned all there was to know in poultry in a year, and with the mistakes corrected that were made the first year the beginner will feel both encouraged to enlarge each year, with a better profit as the years go on. The right start means much to the average beginner, and in many cases a failure has been made, whereas, if the proper fowls had been purchased, a success would have been attained. It is the little things in poultry that go toward success, and if these are mastered and the right stock purchased success is assured.

MOISTURE IN INCUBATION.

One of the most important factors in incubation, as pointed out by the poultry experts, is to provide proper moisture conditions. To determine whether there is the right amount of moisture for the egg during the incubation period the size of the air cell in the egg should be studied as the chick develops. This can be done best by marking a few eggs, so that each time the eggs are tested pencil lines will be drawn around the eggs so marked as the edge of the air cell. If the moisture conditions have been right during the incubation period, the experts say, the air cell may occupy, at the end of the thirteenth day, from one-third to two-fifths of the interior space. If the eggs are too dry it is not possible to replace the moisture.

A normal fresh egg contains all the moisture necessary if the egg is incubated under proper moisture conditions. For these reasons moisture should be supplied not with the idea of putting it into the egg, but rather with that of keeping the air about the eggs so humid that an excessive evaporation of the eggs contents will be prevented. Unless the manufacturers of incubators so direct, moisture should never be supplied in the incubator itself. In most cases the proper moisture conditions may be secured by keeping the floor of the incubator cellar well dampened during the incubation period.

FARM AND GARDEN

BEST TIME TO PRUNE.

"After three score years of experience in orchard culture," said a fruit grower, "allow me to say something on the proper time for pruning. There is but one proper time, the month of June, when the new bark forms on the wood."

Then he went on to say that more orchards are ruined by being pruned at improper times than from all other causes. If pruned in autumn or winter the bark will dry around the stump and heal there, but never over the end, this exposed stump will rot out in a few years, leaving a ragged hole where the water can enter, and the decay of the centre of the whole tree begins, shortening its life many years. If pruned in the spring, the wound bleeds, the sap often running down and killing the bark below, making a black unsightly wound, which never heals over, and the whole tree is subject to decay.

If pruned in June when the new bark and wood are forming, the wound begins to heal at once, and no matter what the size of the branch cut may be, the wound will heal before decay begins if the tree is vigorous and in good condition.

Care should be taken to cut close to the trunk or larger branch, so that the wound may heal over the end, for if cut two or three inches from the trunk or main branch, nature forgets to carry the necessary material to heal over the wound, and again the water enters and decay occurs.

When from an accident the effect of snow or ice, a large branch is broken, cut temporarily, leaving a foot or more to be cut again close to the trunk in the month of June.

The reason farmers generally prune in early spring is that they then have time and little else to do and are anxious to be at work, and thus have some excuse; but if they could realize the damage they are doing to their own property, they might perhaps refrain and put their labor to better account at the proper season.

The New York Agricultural Experiment Station has demonstrated that uncovered pruning wound heals quickest.

Rarely do experiments in agriculture disprove commonly accepted beliefs; but this has been the result from a four-year investigation of the New York Station on the effect of various protective materials on the wounds of fruit trees due to pruning. Though many materials were used in the test, none was found to be of benefit; for in every case untreated wounds made as good recovery as those covered. In nearly every instance the supposedly helpful covering injured the exposed tissues and retarded healing; the mechanical exclusion of the germs of plant diseases by impervious coverings and the destruction of these germs by preservants and disinfectants proved without value; while wounds kept from drying out by some protective material healed no more rapidly than those left open to the air.

Paints made from white lead, white zinc and yellow ochre are used in the test, as well as coal tar and avenarius carbolineum, which are preservatives and disinfectants, and shellac, which forms an impervious coating over the wounds. In different tests extending over four years these materials were applied, both immediately following pruning and after a delay of six weeks, to allow some drying of the surface, to considerable numbers of large and small wounds of young and old apple trees pruned in the winter and in the spring, and the action of the same materials on the smaller wounds of winter-pruned peach trees was under observation for three years.

In no case was there benefit from the use of any of the coverings. On peach all were so harmful that it may be safely said no covering should ever be used on trees of this or presumably of any stone fruit. The injury from shellac was only slight. On the apple the avenarius carbolineum was very harmful, that yellow ochre paint retarded healing noticeably and destroyed some tissue, the white lead and white zinc were less injurious and the shellac did little or no harm, but no good.

The series of careful, long-continued comparisons and observations indicated unmistakably that pruning wounds on peaches and other stone fruits should never be treated with so-called "protective" covering materials since their use is decidedly harmful. On the apple and other pome fruits there can be no gain from treating small wounds, at least, with considerable liability to harm. On very large wounds, which heal only after several years or not at all it is possible that some protection of the wound may be used in keeping out disease germs, but of this the experiments give no proof.

NOTES.

Specialists in the U. S. Bureau of Animal Industry have satisfied themselves that glanders vaccine is not effective in rendering horses immune from this dangerous disease. All of the immunized animals subsequently contracted the disease from natural exposure.

If you want to make first-class cows from your young heifers, feed well while they are carrying their first calf and don't forget to handle them. Show them that you are their friend. Get them to like you, and they will respond when you come around with the milk pail. There is more to the handling of a young heifer than many farmers are aware of.

In growing asparagus root have the rows two feet apart or further if desired; seed dropped about two inches apart and covered with from one to two inches of soil, depending on its character. A radish seed about every foot, which will germinate in a few days, and mark the rows, for cultivation may begin very soon after sowing. Give the plot clean tillage all summer; mulch with fresh horse manure in August if the plants are not making satisfactory growth. More rapid growth may also be stimulated by top-dressing with nitrate of soda at the rate of 100 pounds to the acre. A manure mulch will give better results if the soil lacks humus or is inclined to be droughty. Spray the plants if necessary to protect them from asparagus beetles.

Alfalfa in an orchard where thorough spraying with arsenical poisons is necessary renders the hay cut from must be considered entirely from the standpoint of a cover crop to shade the ground and build up soil fertility.

The horse has the sense of hearing very highly developed, and distinguishes sounds and probably also the difference in sounds, from a very great distance.

A practical farmer says he has used the following method to successfully keep the borer about the lower trunk of fruit trees in check. The soil is removed for about four inches around the crown of the trunk, and all gum and decayed wood removed. He then makes a solution containing 15 pounds copper sulphate, 30 pounds hydrated lime, one pound arsenate of lead and 50 gallons of water. The trunk is then soaked from base to crotch, and often the larger limbs if they are rough. This is done in the spring as well as in the fall, and he states that he never has trouble with the borer.

THE DAWN OF YOUNG WOMANHOOD

Girls upon the threshold of womanhood often drift into a decline in spite of all care and attention. Even strong and lively girls become weak, depressed, irritable and listless. It is the dawn of womanhood—a crisis in the life of every girl—and prompt measures should be taken to keep the blood pure and rich with the red tint of health. If the body is not in a healthy condition at this critical stage, grave disorders may result, and future life become a burden. Deadly consumption often follows this crisis. In the lives of young women Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have saved thousands of young girls from what might have been life-long invalidism or early death. They are a blood-builder of unequalled merit, strengthening weak nerves and producing a liberal supply of rich, red blood, which every girl needs to sustain her strength.

Over and over again Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have proved their value to women and girls whose health was failing. Miss Jennie Giroux, St. Jerome, Que., says: "At the age of eighteen my health was completely shattered; I was suffering from anaemia with all its attendant evils. The trouble forced me to leave school. I suffered from headaches, was tired and breathless at the least exertion. I had no appetite and my face and lips were literally bloodless. A good friend advised the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and thanks to this great medicine I am again enjoying good health, with a good appetite, good color and a spirit of energy."

Every anaemic girl can be made well and strong through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Bad Teeth and Bad Health.

The care of the teeth is often referred to as essential to good health, and it has been quite clearly established that there is a direct connection between the condition of the teeth or gums and the health of the possessor. Decayed teeth or diseased gums may be the cause of poison circulating throughout the system. It may happen in this way.

A series of canals, known as lymphatic tissue, connects the several parts of the body, including the gums.

If the teeth are not cleaned and the mouth kept in good condition, microbes or germs collect on the gums or teeth. When they become so numerous as to overpopulate the mouth they are pushed into the lymphatic canals, where they get busy developing disease in the body.

CROP OUTLOOK IS FAVORABLE

Latest Bulletin On Canadian Prospects Satisfactory.

Great Increase in Acreage Sown to Grains.

A press bulletin issued by the census and statistics office is of special interest as giving the preliminary estimate of the area sown to grain crops on May 31, as reported by correspondents. The reports received show that in the Maritime Provinces cold and rainy weather during May delayed farm work, and at the end of the month a good deal of seeding had still to be completed. In Quebec and Ontario cold winds and frost, coming after the exceptionally warm weather of April, retarded growth. In these provinces the frosts injured pastures, but did little damage to grain crops. In the Northwest provinces growth was checked somewhat by cold and frosty nights, but, on the whole, conditions continue to be favorable. In some parts of Manitoba and Saskatchewan the need of rain was being felt. In Alberta and British Columbia the condition of the grain crops was generally favorable.

AREAS SOWN TO WHEAT.

Wheat is estimated to occupy this year a total area of 12,896,000 acres, which is more by 1,662,300 acres, or 14.8 p.c., than the area sown for 1914, and more by 2,602,100 acres, or 25 p.c., than the area harvested in 1914, the area sown for last year having been reduced by 939,700 acres, the estimated aggregate of total failures through the winter-killing of fall wheat (211,500 acres), and through drought affecting spring wheat (728,100 acres). Not only is the wheat area this year, under the double stimulus of patriotic impulse and high prices, largest area ever sown to wheat in Canada. As previously reported the area to be harvested of fall sown wheat is 1,208,700 acres, the balance shows an increase in the wheat area. It is the three Northwest provinces which preponderate in the national effort to produce more wheat. The total area sown to wheat in these provinces is 11,659,700 acres, an increase over last year's harvested area of 2,224,300 acres, or 25 per cent. In Manitoba the area is 3,166,500 acres, an increase of 21 per cent., in Saskatchewan it is 6,642,100 acres, an increase of 24 per cent., and in Alberta it is 1,850,700 acres, an increase of 35 per cent. Rather more than half of the total wheat area of Canada is in the single Province of Saskatchewan.

OTHER FIELD CROPS.

Oats are estimated to occupy a total area in Canada of 11,427,000 acres an increase over last year's harvested area of 1,365,300 acres, or 13 per cent. barley, 1,518,400 acres, as compared with 1,495,600 acres last year; rye, 116,440 acres against 111,280 acres; peas, 18,470 acres, compared with 205,950 acres; mixed grains, 475,000 acres, against 465,?00 acres; hay and clover, 7,788,100 acres, against 7,997,000 acres, and alfalfa, 91,180 acres, against 90,385 acres.

CONDITION AND ANTICIPATED YIELD.

Measured in percentage of a standard of 100 representing a full crop, all the grain crops were reported as showing a high average, the points being as follows: Fall wheat 86, spring wheat 96, oats and barley 92, rye 91, peas 92 and mixed grains 91. Hay and clover with 86, pastures and alfalfa with 87 are not so good, these crops having suffered from cold and frosty nights during May. Converting the points of standard condition for the principal grain crops into a scale of 100 representing the average of the past five years, 1910-1914, the result—assuming conditions between now and harvest to be equal to the average—is an anticipated increase in the yield per acre of 13.6 per cent. for fall wheat, 2.6 per cent. for spring wheat, and 2.5 per cent. for rye. For oats and barley the indications are for yields slightly below the average, or to the extent of 1.5 per cent for oats and 0.7 per cent. for barley.

End of the Locomotive.

When railroad locomotives have served their time of usefulness or are badly damaged through accidents they are ordinarily scrapped and disposed of as salvage. This at least is the practice followed by many of the companies which turn over their obsolete equipment of this kind to firms which junk it. After the sheeting is removed from the sides of the locomotive the cutting is done with oxy-acetylene torches. Castings, malleable iron and the different grades of metal are separated as the work proceeds.—Popular Mechanics.

DRINKS FOR WARM DAYS

The wise and hospitable hostess will see to it that some cool, refreshing beverage, of simple or intricate mixing, is always ready for impromptu use for the unexpected arrival of informal gathering on the lawn or verandah.

There is a wide assortment of tempting drinks which have been experimented with by a woman who has travelled the world over and has brought recipes from foreign lands, as well as from the sunny South far famed for its liquid refreshments.

Her directions for a sherry flip are quite worth while. Beat up one egg thoroughly with a teaspoonful of sugar; pour onto this a wineglass of sherry and mix again. Fill up the glass with shaved ice and milk and shake well with a shaker. Strain into a champagne glass and grate a little nutmeg over the top.

Nothing is more appetizing than iced tea or tea punch, as we recall it. For plain iced tea put a teaspoonful of Ceylon tea in a large pitcher and pour over it a quart of boiling water. Cover with a folded napkin and let stand for ten minutes. Strain and add sugar, about one pound. The juice of lemons or mint juice may be added.

To brew what is called tea punch the juice of six lemons and two oranges is added, this being served with ice and mineral water.

Many hostesses have iced coffee ready to serve during the warm days. This is nothing more than a strong, black coffee, sweetened and placed in a wine cooler, with plenty of crushed ice about it. This should be served in tall, thin, slender glasses with a spoonful of whipped cream on top. Iced chocolate may be similarly prepared and served. The Orientals add a bit of cinnamon to their chilled chocolate.

For a warm weather drink, especially for serving in the afternoon or evening, the mint julep holds high favor. A good old Kentucky recipe is the following: Put one-half teaspoonful of orange bitters in a glass with several tender mint leaves. Crush the mint well in the bitters and to the mixture add one sherry glass of rye whiskey. Fill the glass with shaved ice and put on top a thin slice of orange and a spray of the mint frosted in white sugar.

Cider cup, though not a commonly served summer drink, is the specialty of a certain summer hostess who has gained quite a reputation for her unusual and tempting beverages. A layer of finely pounded ice is put into the bottom of a large glass pitcher. Then mix together one quart of cider, two wineglasses of sherry and one of brandy. Sweeten to taste and pour over the ice. Add the thinly cut rind of two lemons, one sliced orange and one-half of a crisp cucumber shaved thin. Let the ice melt a little, then add a glass of Curacoa and grate a bit of nutmeg on the top before serving.

PINKERTON

The local branch of Canadian Order of Foresters attended service in a body at the Presbyterian Church here on Sunday last. A large crowd listened to an eloquent discourse by Rev. Mr. Gall.

Mr. Ernest Reid attended a picnic at Port Elgin on Monday. His place as pedagogue was suitably filled by his brother "Mac."

Mr. John Thompson of Glamis is working at Garland Bros.

Work commenced this week on the new sidewalk which is being built from Mr. A. Gregg's down to the pavement already in. Pinkerton will thus have a complete chain of pavement from end to end and it is to be complimented on the splendid progress it has made in this line during the last few years.

Messrs Dave Robinson of Kincardine and Clyde McKeeman of Glamis spent Sunday evening in the burg. Both report a good time.

A number from here attended the Garden Party at Eden Grove last week and also at Mr. T. Chisholm's this week.

Pte. Andy Cullham was in the burg on Saturday.

Miss Mae. Alexander returned from Guelph on Saturday.

Arrangements were well underway for a picnic to Silver Lake on July 2nd and great was the consternation of the promoters when they found that the grounds were engaged for that day.

Re War Stamps

An Ottawa despatch says:" While the one and two cents postage stamps upon which the words "war tax" have been impressed may be accepted for the prepayment of postage and may also be used for the payment of war duties in all cases, this does not apply to such war stamps of higher denominations according to a notice sent out by the post office department. No postage stamps of higher denomination than one and two cents upon which the words 'war tax' have been impressed may be accepted as postage nor any inland revenue war tax stamp of any denomination whatever."

Rod and Gun.

July Rod and Gun covers a considerable range in its outdoor stories for this month. Salt Water Fishing near Victoria; The Hunt of L'Anglais, which purports to be the narrative of a French Canadian habitant; The Home of Jasper the Yellowhead; The Trail Makers of the Quetico; The Greatest of Big Game Fishing, being an account of the catching of a record Tuna off Port Medway N S and One Day's Fishing on Temagami, are some of the articles appearing in this issue and in addition there is a full account of the Dominion of Canada Trap Shooting Tournament and other Trap Notes as well as the special departments devoted to guns and ammunition and fishing matters. Deplores Wet Canteen

At Bruce County Unions successful convention at Paisley, the following resolution was passed unanimously: "Whereas we believe that the legalized liquor traffic is one of the national sins which incur the just displeasure of Almighty God, and more especially so when during this worldwide war the foodstuffs used in the manufacture of the liquor that materially and is our soldier boys for service are needed both to feed the armies and for home consumption, and whereas Canadian mothers consented to their boys going overseas to fight for the liberty and honor of the motherland and her colonies with the distinct understanding that no liquor be allowed them, and are now withholding their consent because of the wet canteen, therefore resolved, that Bruce County Women's Christian Temperance Union, in convention assembled, do deplore the persistent furnishing of the wet canteen overseas to our Canadian soldiers, and the rum rations served on the firing line, and hereby vigorously and emphatically protest against the same."

John McNeill's Advice

When the Rev. John McNeill was holding revival services, a young fellow, thinking to perplex him, sent up the following note, requesting a public reply: "Dear Mr. McNeill—If you are seeking to enlighten young men kindly tell me who was Cain's wife." Mr. McNeill read the note, and then said in the blandest tone possible: "I love young men—enquirers for truth especially—and should like to give this young man a word of advice. It is this: Don't lose your soul's salvation enquiring after other men's wives."

Passed Normal Exams.

The results of the recent final examinations at the Normal Schools appeared in the daily papers on Saturday, the following exstudents of the Walkerton High School, securing interim second-class certificates:—Edith Hilbert, Jennie Long, Sarah Rae, Harold Ernel, William Weiler and James Thomson.

Flach Dismissed.

Geo. Flach of Greenock who has spent the past week in gaol, charged with being insane has been dismissed by the authorities, the medical examiners being unable to find sufficient evidence to convict and send him to the asylum. Flach came up for hearing on Monday and was given his freedom.

Spoiled by Rain

The Brant Farmers Club annual picnic was held on the banks of the Saugeen at Maple Hill on Thursday afternoon last. There was a crowd in attendance, but the heavy rain which came at about five o'clock put a damper on proceedings and spoiled the best part of the afternoon's program, the lunch.

Receipts Amounted to $100.00.

The garden party held on the lawn of Mr. Thos Chisholm on Tuesday of last week was the most successful held in this vicinity this season. The total receipts amounted to about $100 and after paying expenses the treasurer had $81 on hand, part of which will be devoted to Red Cross work and part to the Bruce County Hospital.

Presentation

On Friday evening Miss Hazel Irwin student of the Ripley High School, was presented with a beautiful ivory toilet set in a leather case, by her school associates and friends. The presentation was made at the home of Mr. Thos. E. Morgan on the eve of Miss Irwin's departure for her home in Walkerton.—Ripley Express

Signed for Fourth

Arthur Farrer, son of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Farrer, is the first Walkerton young man to sign up for service in the fourth Canadian Contingent. Arthur Farrer and Charlie Bruce went to Paisley on Tuesday for medical examination, but the latter failed to come up to the required standard, Private Farrer leaves on Tuesday for London.

Last Trip Home

Half of the members of the 34th battalion training at London were given a holiday on Dominion Day, and the following boys spent the day at their homes here:—Ptes. Ray Hyslop, Norman Denny, Symon Small, Louis Reinstadtler, Fred Jewel, A. Dean and Reg McCarter. The boys stated that this would be their last visit home before going to England.

More Bruce Casualties.

During the past week the following casualties among the Bruce men have been announced:—Corporal Geo. Knight, Kincardine, killed; Pte. Roy Hunter, Wiarton, killed. In Saturday's list among the missing was published the name of Pte. Alfred Wygell, Walkerton, but this was apparently a mistake in the address as we have as yet been unable to find any trace of Wygell having enlisted here.

To Teach in Brant

Misses Jennie Long and Eva McNally who passed the recent exams at Stratford Normal School have accepted schools in their vicinity, the former at Baird's and the latter at Nesbitt's school in Brant.

Barn Destroyed

During the electrical storm which passed over North Brant on Thursday afternoon, the barn of Mr. Dan McGill was struck by lightning and completely destroyed. Mr. and Mrs. McGill were away from home at the time and the entire contents of the barn were also consumed. There was insurance in the Farmers Central of $1500, but this does not cover Mr. McGill's heavy loss.

Fought in Stable

As a sequel to the horse cases which were heard in the police court on Saturday, Henry Ernest and J Forsythe another horseman, engaged in a fistic fight in the stables of the Walker House immediately after the trial. Both men were more or less bruised, Forsythe receiving two badly blackened optics. As the fight took place in the hotel stables, the authorities were powerless being unable to take any action against the pugilists.

Defeated in Hanover

The Junior lacrosse match which was played in Hanover on Friday last resulted in a win for the Hanover team by a score of 13-9. The score at half-time was 6-2 in favor of Walkerton but the locals were unable to stand the pace and the last two quarters were all Hanover's. The defeat of the Walkerton youngsters can be largely attributed to the fact that on the Hanover lineup, there were no fewer than five Intermediate men. The next game will be played here on July 12th.

Dominion Day

Dominion Day passed very quietly in Walkerton. The usual large number of citizens spent the day at the lake shore or attending the celebration at Port Elgin, while a good number took in the picnic at Flemmings Grove near Chepstow. Both the Port Elgin and Chepstow celebrations are highly spoken of by those who attended. Some of the picnics which were arranged by local parties, were cancelled owing to the heavy rain at noon and others which were held were spoiled by a second downpour at five o'clock.

Mildmay 3, O. S. 1

The controversy between the Mildmay and O.S. football teams was settled by the W. F. A. last week, the clubs being ordered to replay the series of games. The first game was played in Mildmay on Tuesday evening, the game resulting in a win for the Mildmay Stars by a score of 3-1. Thus Mildmay goes to play the return game with a lead of two goals, but those who saw the game in Mildmay on Tuesday claim that this margin is not sufficient for the Stars to win on the round. The return game will be played in Owen Sound on Friday.

Fifty in Active Service.

There are now fifty Walkerton young men in active service. Since commencement of the war over thirty have enlisted for active overseas service in the three contingents so far recruited. Five left with the first contingent six with the second contingent and nineteen with the third. Besides these, five have gone to Bermuda to do garrison duty and twenty-two volunteers under Capt Clark are in the company which is guarding the wireless station at Tobermory. As recruiting for the fourth overseas force has just commenced, recruits are coming in but slowly.

Fined $20 and Costs.

Henry Ernest, Brant, Andrew Hanmore, Cargill, and Jas. Cassidy, Brant, appeared in police court here on Saturday last to answer to the charge of travelling stallions which were not enrolled which is contrary to the statutes of Ontario. Hanmore and Cassidy pleaded guilty and were assessed $20 and cost amounting to $28.75 each while Ernest pleaded not guilty and his case went to trial. There was not sufficient evidence to convict, however, and an adjournment was made so that additional evidence will be secured. The case will come up for a second hearing on Saturday at 10 o'clock.

Struck by Lightning.

Mr. E. Roland a farmer living near Hanover was struck by lightning while sitting in his house during the heavy thunderstorm which passed over that section on Wednesday afternoon of last week. The bolt came down the chimney and apparently split on striking the floor one part going through the summer kitchen and demolishing the stove there, and the other passing through the winter kitchen in which Mr. Roland was sitting. He was knocked unconscious and for a time it was feared that he would not survive but last reports state that although severely burned he is recovering. Fortunately the house did not catch fire. Had Mr. Roland received the full bolt there is little doubt but that he would have been instantly killed.

Schnurr—Schnitzler.

The marriage took place in the Formosa R. C. church on Tuesday morning of Mr. Andrew J. Schnurr, to Miss Annie Schnitzler also of Carrick, who for the past three years has been on the staff of the Hartley House, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Father Doyle. Miss Olivia Knoll attended the bride while Mr. Jos. Schnitzler performed the duties of best man. After the marriage a reception was held at the home of the bride's mother on the Elora road, which a large number of guests attended, including many from Walkerton. Mr. and Mrs. Schnurr will reside on the groom's farm in Carrick which he recently purchased from his father.

Henderson—Mauer

A very pretty wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. Mauer, in Hanover at six o'clock on Monday morning when their youngest daughter, Lillian Pearl, was united in marriage to Mr. Guy Henderson, of Walkerton. The young couple were unattended, the ceremony being performed in the presence of the immediate relatives only. After the nuptial knot had been tied the wedding party partook of a delightful wedding breakfast, after which the newly married couple entrained for a wedding trip to Niagara Falls, Buffalo, and Detroit. Both Mr. and Mrs. Henderson are well known in Hanover and Walkerton and the many presents of which the bride was the recipient bear testimony of the high esteem in which they are held by their many friends. On their return Mr. and Mrs. Henderson will take up their residence in Walkerton.

Let off With Warning.

An apparently brazen attempt at fraud on the part of a farmer hailing from a local option locality was queered by Chief Ferguson, when on Saturday he discovered in a load of hay which he was weighing at the town weigh scales, three beer kegs, one case of bottles and two boxes of butter. These were in the hay when weighed, but were not in the empty wagon when it returned to the weigh scales. Chief Ferguson said nothing as to his knowledge of the additional weight in the hay and proceeded to take action against the farmer, charging him with fraud. The farmer, however, learned that the authorities were after him and on Monday came to Walkerton, settled with the purchaser of the hay, and stated to Mr. Ferguson that he had not intended to defraud, having hidden the kegs in the hay as he was afraid that a complaint might be made against him for having so much booze in a local option territory. As he made things right, the chief withdrew the charge, letting him off with a warning

Death of Mrs. Hehn.

A death under very sad circumstances occurred in Walkerton in the early hours of Tuesday morning when Mrs. A. Hehn passed away one hour after giving birth to a child, her death in the doctor's certificate being attributed to goitre and collapse at time of child-birth. The deceased whose maiden name was Thusnelda Perschbacher, was 28 years of age. She was born in Williamsford, Ont., in 1886, and was married in Chesley to Mr. Hehn twelve years ago. They resided in Hanover for nine years and three years ago, moved to Walkerton, Mr Hehn having purchased the City Bakery. During her three years residence here, Mrs. Hehn has made many friends and her early demise is deeply regretted. Besides her husband, to whom is extended every sympathy, the deceased is survived by two little boys age 9 and 7 years, and the newborn male infant. Mr. Frank Perschbacher of Hanover is a brother of the deceased. The funeral takes place from the family residence on Friday to the Methodist church where service will be held thence to the Hanover cemetery for interment.

Mayor Lippert Criticised.

Mayor Lippert has been criticised in some quarters for his action with regard to the two Turks who were soliciting alms in Walkerton recently, to be donated to the Christian church in Turkey. These collectors had the acquiescence of the government at Ottawa to collect for this cause in Canada and their procedure on entering any town was to seek out the Mayor and ask his consent to collect in his municipality. This they did when arriving here and after assuring himself as to the validity of their credentials, Mr. Lippert gave them a letter of commendation. However, knowing that there have been many calls for Red Cross, Patriotic and other work, the mayor did not urge that contributions be made, leaving it entirely to discretion of those approached. As those ministers were not followers of Mohammet, and were collecting monies to be used in the advancement of Christianity in their country, their work was on a par with the local clergymen when asking for contributions to foreign missions, and Mayor Lippert in giving them this letter, took the only course open to him under the circumstances and followed the example of other mayors in Ontario. None but the narrow-minded would criticize him for his action.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

"He made a terrible scene, this morning, without any reason whatever. A scrap of a letter, which he saw lying on my table, was the cause of it all. As if I could not have concealed it if I had wished! But he was in a jealous mood. He scolded, he threatened, he wept. Yes, he wept. What stupidity! A man who weeps does not move me at all. He only makes me think him ridiculous."

"You do not love him, then?"

"I do not love him as I did six months ago. Such an affection is delightful, but of course it cannot last."

"Oh, I know you are a practical woman."

"You say that as a sarcasm. I accept it as a compliment. Yes, I am a practical woman, and I am proud of it. Jacques has behaved very well toward me, but he gambles and for some time past he has been losing. This sours his temper. He torments me, and he torments himself. Why should I bear this, I ask you? If I were tired of him, could I not show him the door? If he is tired of me, can he not remain away? But in that case let us do so decently and without making a scene."

"Would it not be well to tell him so?"

"If you wish."

"But where can I see him?"

"Here."

"He had not left the house, then, as the servant told me?"

"Not at all. Go and give him a lecture."

"I came here for that purpose."

"Then you are doubly welcome. Do you wish me to take you to him?"

"It would be very amiable on your part to do so."

She rose with a laugh and said.

"Ah, there is no one like me for amiability."

"That is what they tell me."

"They are very indiscreet."

"And why so? That is the way good reputations are established."

They crossed the drawing-room.

"You are with Woreseff on his yacht?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Does he play the role of sultan, the dear Count?"

"Still."

"There is a man who knows how to live."

"Perfectly."

They had reached the first landing. She stopped, and pointing to the door:

"Jacques is in there," she said.

The actress, standing there in her rose-colored gown, with her fresh complexion and her brilliant eyes, the light falling on her from a window that overlooked the sea, was so beautiful that Davidoff paused an instant to look at her. He could understand the irresistible spell wielded by this fascinating and feline creature. He could understand the pleasure a man might feel in allowing himself to be torn by these polished, sharp and delicate claws. In her he saw the sphynx who devours those who are bold enough to attempt to solve the eternal riddle she propounded. His eyes expressed his thoughts so clearly that Clemence said with a smile:

"What would you have? One must protect one's-self."

And she ran lightly downstairs. Davidoff rapped, and a voice responded, "Come in."

He turned the knob and opened the door, and beside the open window, buried in the depths of a large sofa, he saw Jacques, his eyes hollow, his lips livid. As he recognized the doctor the young man grew a shade paler and his brow clouded. He rose, and going toward his visitor slowly stretched out his hand.

"You are angry with me," he said.

"A little."

"Only a little? I do not deserve so much indulgence. I told you last night that I was a coward. Well, you have received the proof of it soon enough."

He spoke through his clenched teeth, with a slight contraction of the features. Davidoff, whom he inspired with pity, sat down beside him and said affectionately:

"What has happened since we parted to prevent you keeping your engagement with me? It ought to have been a pleasant one to keep."

"Can anything be pleasant to me?" responded Jacques, in a low voice. "All that I do is hateful and miserable. An evil spirit has taken possession of me, and inspires me with the most fatal thoughts."

"Resist it," returned the doctor. "You allowed yourself to yield to my influence a few hours ago; do so again. Take your hat and overcoat, and follow me. There is still time."

"No," answered Jacques, with determination. "I shall not leave this."

"What Clemence has told me, then, is true?"

"Ah, you have seen her? And she complained of me, did she not? The wretch! It is she who is the cause of all my misery. Yes, she is destroying me she is killing me. It would be impossible to conceive what she makes me suffer. I know not what madness she has inspired me with. Can you understand that I should be jealous of her? This morning we had a frightful scene. She forbade me the house, and I am here still! I am here still! And why? Because I cannot live without her. Because I would sue for her smiles on my knees if it were necessary!"

"Make the effort to keep away from her for a few days."

"No, no, that would be impossible. What a void in my existence if she should pass out of it. No! I have sacrificed everything for this woman. I have made everything yield to my love for her. To give her up now would be to end everything."

He buried his face in his hands and was silent for a few moments; then in an accent of desperation:

"When I am at the end of my resources," he said, "then I will see her no more. Ah, that day is not far off, for luck is against me. But I keep on playing, although I know perfectly well what the end will be. You see it is not easy to preach to me, for I am beforehand with you. Abandon me to my fate, my friend. I am not worth the efforts you have made to save me."

Davidoff had listened to Jacques' words with a pang at his heart, studying with mingled curiosity and compassion this pitiable form of insanity. He was familiar with the feeling which had led so many men to madness or suicide. He knew it was made up of the intoxication of the senses, the exasperation of wounded vanity, and a sort of mysterious terror which takes possession of those who, habituated to the tumult of a feverish existence, see themselves condemned suddenly to a life of isolation and silence. The transition was like passing from the gaiety of a ballroom to the stillness of a Trappist monastery. Only a strong soul and a steady head could bear it with calmness.

"Come with me," said the doctor to Jacques. "I give you my word that I will not quit you until you are cured, mentally and physically."

Jacques burst into a fit of nervous laughter that sounded harsh and painful in the doctor's ears.

"No, no, abandon me to my fate," he cried. "I do not want to be cured! I am already sentenced, and nothing can change the decrees of fate. I have lived only for happiness. Anguish and misery are my doom!"

He lowered his voice as if with sudden terror.

"You know well; it is not I who act, who speak, who suffer, and who complain. There is another within me who is leading me on to my fate. Even if I wished to stop myself I could not do so. Ah, I feel this implacable soul agitating itself furiously. It is jealous! It takes vengeance of me on myself. So long as it inhabits my body I must suffer. On the day on which I shall be delivered from it—"

Davidoff interrupted Jacques with a quick gesture; he knitted his brow and was on the point of saying: "You are mad! Laurier has disappeared, it is true, but Laurier is still alive. I humored your fancy because I had a conviction that only faith would give you back the strength to live. But since you have reached such a state of hallucination as to make your recovered health the cause of your ruin, it is my duty to declare the truth to you."

One thought, however, made him pause. "He will not believe me!" he said to himself. "I must show him his friend restored to mental health in order to prove to him that he himself may recover his sanity." He turned toward the young man and said very gently:

"Since you do not wish to accompany me to Paris I will go alone, then. I shall see your mother and sister there."

A shadow passed over Jacques' face, and his eyes shone as if moist with tears.

"Thanks," he said in a choking voice; "try to make them forgive me the evil I have done them. They are so good, so affectionate!"

He rose, and a quick shudder passed through his frame.

"Oh, I am a wretch!" he cried. "It would be better for me to be dead!"

At this moment the sound of a clear voice calling "Jacques!" in the garden below, was heard.

He advanced hastily to the window. Clemence was gathering roses. She saw him, and cried gayly:

"Well, is your sulking over? The air is delightful. Come down, and we will go to Villers to breakfast."

Jacques turned to Davidoff, and cried in agitation:

"She calls me, you see. She is waiting for me. She is not so bad as I said. She has terrible moments, it is true, but at heart she loves me. Come, my friend."

He drew Davidoff toward the stairs. They went down into the hall. There Jacques pressed the doctor's hand tightly, and as if impatient to be alone with Clemence said:

"Adieu. Once more, pardon me. Reassure my mother and cure my sister—Ah, that above all! Poor child! Adieu."

And with rapid steps he hurried toward the garden where his pitiless tyrant awaited him. Davidoff, already in the street, strode quickly away.

Through an opening to the shore he caught a glimpse of the yacht, which was steaming out to sea, leaving in its wake a trail of black smoke.

"I am free," he cried; "let me profit by it."

He went to the telegraph office, took a sheet of paper, and standing at the desk wrote these words:

Pierre Laurier, Care of Monsieur le Cure de Torrevecchio, Corsica:

"Return at once. Your presence has become indispensable. When you arrive here wait for nothing, but join me immediately at the Grand Hotel.

Davidoff."

He gave the telegram to the clerk, paid for it, and went out murmuring:

"If I do not succeed in saving the brother, I shall at least try to save the sister." And he took the train for Paris.

CHAPTER VI.

Davidoff's telegram was delivered to Pierre Laurier on the very day of Agostino's marriage with the daughter of a well-to-do farmer of San Pellegrino. The young sailor had prospered in his trading expeditions to the Mediterranean ports, and he brought a fortune of six thousand francs to his bride. The latter, a rosy brunette of sixteen from the mountains, had a house and some olive groves of her own. The young people had loved each other for a year past, and on the understanding that Agostino was to give up his seafaring life the marriage had now been celebrated.

On emerging from the church of San Pellegrino, the newly-married pair were greeted by a succession of shots fired in their honor. One might have thought from the noise that the villagers were engaged in a vendetta and were trying to exterminate each other, vivas broke forth from the guests. Every face beamed with joy, and the bright sunshine, the heat and the smell of the powder seemed to produce a general feeling of intoxication.

Pierre, giving his arm to the little Marietta, whose companion he had been in the church, followed with delighted eyes every detail of the animated and novel scene, dreaming already of the beautiful picture he would paint of it, and which has since become so famous under the title of "A Corsican Marriage."

His heart was at peace, and his mind had recovered its balance. Not a shadow darkened his soul. He was completely absorbed in the contemplation of the happiness of these people whom he loved, and in the simplicity and tranquility of whose patriarchal life he had been able to forget his unworthy passion and to regain the dignity of his manhood. The wedding guests now proceeded to the house of the bride's father, there to partake of the banquet set forth in honor of the newly-married pair. As they assembled in the grounds, a little boy, who served the good cure of Torrevecchio as an acolyte, pushed through the crowd and running up to the venerable priest, handed him a blue envelope which had just been left at the presbytery. To cover the distance between Torrevecchio and San Pellegrino, the little fellow, with his mountaineer's legs, had taken only an hour. He arrived breathless, his face covered with dust and perspiration.

The cure read the address on the envelope and then handed it to Pierre, saying affectionately:

"Here, my dear child, this is for you."

A group had already formed around the young man, who, with clouded brow and lips tightly drawn, held within his fingers the despatch he had received, without power to open it.

"What is it?" asked Agostino, anxiously.

"That blue paper," said the boy, "which was brought a little while ago from Bastia by the postman. He made a special trip with it as it seemed to be urgent, so Maddalena, the servant of M. le Cure, said to me, 'Run like a flash, do not stop until you have given it to Monsieur. Something serious must have happened, for in three years or more there has not come to Torrevecchio a paper like that!' So I set out without a moment's delay, and here I am."

As he spoke, he wiped off with the back of his hand the perspiration which was running down his face, showing his white teeth in a broad smile of delight at having performed his mission so successfully.

"You are going to drink a glass of Tallano and to eat a morsel of bread with us, Jacopo," said Agostino. He pushed the child toward his father-in-law, and then, greatly troubled by the uneasiness which Pierre's face betrayed, he said to him anxiously:

"What is the matter?"

Pierre opened the envelope slowly, unfolded the telegram, and read the imperious summons addressed to him by his friend. He turned pale and his brow clouded. His heart suddenly seemed to contract.

"Is there any bad news?" asked Agostino.

"No," returned the painter, "at least I hope not. But I must leave you. I must go at once to Paris."

"Leave us! And now!" cried the bridegroom sorrowfully. "Wait at least until to-morrow."

"If they had told you when the sea was between you that your sweetheart was ill and might die during your absence," gravely answered Pierre, "would you have delayed going to her?"

Agostino pressed his preserver's hand with emotion and tears filled his eyes.

"No, you are right," he said. "But you must know how much your departure will grieve us."

Pierre drew the young man aside, and there speaking to him with a sudden emotion, which threw a new light on his friend's character and past life, for Agostino said:

"There is no need to cast a gloom over the feast. From here to Torrevecchio by the highroad is a matter of twelve miles. I can hire a carriole at the inn, and go there alone. Once I am on the other side of the mountain, you will explain my absence to your guests, and thank each one of those present for the cordial reception they gave me when I came here. I shall never forget the time that I have spent among you. I was grievously ill, both in heart and mind. In the peaceful and laborious existence I have forgotten the sorrows that I thought were incurable, and it is to you I owe all this—to your mother who has been so good to me, to your little sister who has so often brought to my mind by her naive and winning grace the young girl who is waiting for me now, and finally to you, my brave fellow, to save whose life I gave up my intention of putting an end to my own, when, driven to despair, I was on the point of doing so. You have restored me to myself. It is for your sake that I feel myself still bound to humanity. No! I shall never forget you, and whether in sadness or in joy, my thoughts will often recur to you."

Agostino could scarcely restrain his tears at these words, and more affected by Pierre's departure than he would have been by that of some member of his own family, he began to sob, while the wedding guests, giving themselves up to merriment, were laughing, singing and shouting in the garden. Pierre, after he had in some measure succeeded in calming the young man's grief, said quietly:

"And, now listen to me. It is necessary that I should reach Paris at the earliest possible moment. When does the next boat leave Bastia, and where does it stop?"

"There is a steamer of the Morelli line leaving for Marseilles on Tuesday," answered Agostino. "By going to town you can engage your passage on her, and to-morrow at daybreak you will be out at sea. From Bastia to Marseilles there are thirty hours."

"In three days, then," said Pierre, "I shall be in Paris. From there, my dear Agostino, you must allow me to send some tokens of remembrance to your dear ones. You need have no scruples in the matter. I have lived here with you, wearing the garb of a peasant almost a year, but I am not poor. Put away your Corsican pride; from your brother, your mother, your sister, or your wife you may accept anything. Do not forget me, and be assured that you shall one day see me again. When I return to your island perhaps, if heaven so far favors me, it will not be alone. Embrace me, and adieu until then!"

The two men embraced each other as on the night on which they were tossed about by the engulfing wave, under the pale light of the moon; and when they separated it was with mingled smiles and tears.

Half an hour later Pierre was driving rapidly toward Torrevecchio, and on the same evening, after packing up his pictures and sketches, arrived at Bastia. He alighted at the inn where he had passed his first night on Corsican soil, went to engage his passage on board the steamer, and then entered a clothier's where he replaced his velveteen garments by a complete suit of blue cloth which became him very well.

DISFIGURING RASH SPREAD OVER CHILD

Itching and Burning. Restless and Fretful at Night. Used Cuticura Two Months. No Trace of Trouble.

Kincardine, Ont.—"My child's trouble began with a rash around the ears. This spread over the surface of the body turning to small sores which were itching and burning. The rash also appeared on my child's face and for the time disfigured him. The itching was so intense that it constantly caused him to irritate the eruption. He was restless and fretful at night. "The first two applications of Cuticura Soap and Ointment stopped the burning and eased the itching. In two months' time no trace of the trouble was seen." (Signed) O. Campbell, May 23, 1914.

THE SUMMERY GIRL.

A quiet resort of the summery sort
Is where I am longing to be
Where girls with bright glances are seeking romances,
And cool waves would beckon to me,
Where roaming and boating and swimming and floating
Formality put out of curl,
And [illegible] is the heart of the summery sort
Of summer pretty girl.

I've tried every folly and dangerous folly
The prodigal city affords;
I've toyed to satiety with each variety
Of the bait served us on [illegible];
And none of it thrills me—with equal [illegible]
[illegible]—
And yet I'd get all in a whirl
Could I ramble apart at some summer resort
With a summery sort of a girl.

Oh, dull may things grow at the garden or show
And unspeakably dull at the club!
You may note streaks of gray, feel you're getting passe,
And sigh you're no longer a cub;
But just take to the woods, run away from your goods,
And you'll soon frisk about like a squirrel
When something you start at a summer resort
With a summery sort of a girl.

It is pointed out that June is the favorite month for battles, and we all know that many engagements do culminate in that same period.

In making buttonholes in materials which fray easily it is a great help to stitch twice around on the sewing machine before the hole is cut, as a firmer foundation is secured and no fraying results.

LONDON'S SLUM BABIES.

Gutter Children That Thrive Where They Court Death.

London gutter babies are immune to ordinary diseases and thrive under conditions that would be death to other children, said Dr. Thomas, health officer of the Finsbury district. Dr. Thomas works in the most congested of the London boroughs, where [illegible] families live and sleep in [illegible] rooms.

"Some of these babies," he says, "as soon as or even before they are able to crawl, are placed on the sidewalks early in the day, to be watched or nursed by a girl of four or five years. They are true gutter children. Sometime the immature nurse falls asleep, wearied by her task, and the baby crawls to the other side of the road, heedless of traffic. Both are filthy and gutter stained, but they seem to live. In fact, the stock from which they have sprung rises superior to the ordinary diseases of childhood." Among the cases reported are these:

A baby four months old was given a piece of raw fat and bacon to chew, because the grandmother said bacon was good for babies and canaries.

One baby was dosed with stout and aniseed by the mother as a cure for the colic.

Another baby of nine weeks was fed chiefly on weak tea.

Dr. Thomas complains of the Sairey Gamps who act as nurses in the district, undoing the work of the doctors in many cases. He says their arrogance is equaled only by their ignorance. —New York Tribune.

Wonderful Bilious Remedy Actually Prevents Attacks

There are two great causes of biliousness—they are constipation and defective liver action.

When Dr. Hamilton's Pills are taken, they are not only correct constipated bowels, but act upon the liver as well.

Quite unlike ordinary medicines which purge and give temporary relief, Dr. Hamilton's Pills remove the conditions which cause biliousness, and thus permanent cures are effected. No person who occasionally uses Dr. Hamilton's Pills will ever suffer from the headache, bad stomach or bilious complaint. Get a 25c box to-day.

The Behavior of Kites.

"The tree-tops sing, the lilacs sway,
The clouds skim by like cotton sails;
I've walked the gardener's beds all day
Through watching kites with swinging tails

The kite, when first you take him out
Upon the hill where breezes swish,
Will knock his head and flop about,
And wriggle like a drowning fish.

But give him string, up, up he'll rise,
To soar at ease from place to place;
A-wobbling down when daylight dies,
A smile upon his painted face

If Aunt would only watch the kite,
Perhaps she'd get to understand
The reason why I fret and fight
At being led about by hand.

If she would let me out instead
Across the fields, I'd never fight,
And end by coming home to bed
A-smiling nicely, like the kite."

"Cranks" Catalogued.

A catalogue of murderers is one of the curiosities in the offices of the United States secret service in Washington. In this catalogue all the "cranks" in this country are listed, first alphabetically under their names and aliases, and secondly, under the particular forms taken by their obsessions. The catalogue is kept up by contributions from the police of every town and city where a crank is found.

"A LITTLE QUEER."

His Eccentricity in the End Proved His Own Undoing.

Rev. Mr. Hagamore, to whose memory is a slab in the church at Catsham, Leicestershire, England, was "a little queer." It seems that the reverend gentleman died in January, 1886, leaving all of his property, valued at $3,500, to a railroad porter.

This queer old preacher kept one servant of each sex, whom he locked up every night. His last employment of an evening was to go the rounds of his premises, let loose the dogs and fire off his gun.

He lost his life in a curious manner. Starting out early one morning to let out his servants, the dogs fawned upon him and threw him into a pond of water. The servants heard his cries, but, being locked up, could not render assistance, so the old man was drowned.

When the inventory of his property was taken, he was found to be the owner of 80 gowns, 100 pairs of trousers, 100 pairs of boots, 400 pairs of shoes, 80 wigs (although he had plenty of natural hair), 50 dogs, 90 wagons and carts, 30 wheelbarrows, 200 razors, 19 plows, 50 saddles and 222 pickaxes and shovels. He surely was "a little queer." — London Standard.

Purifying the Air.

A pitcher of cold water placed on the table of an occupied room will absorb all the gases with which the room is filled from the respiration of those eating or sleeping in it. In a few hours this pitcher of cold water will make the air of the room pure, while the water itself will become totally unfit for use.

TRICKS OF BULLETS.

Occasionally They Defy All Rules and Make Queer Flights.

It has been truly said that, once you fire a bullet from a modern rifle, none can forecast what it will do or where it will ultimately come to rest. Even when a bullet has an uninterrupted course, says Mr. Frank Scudamore, in the London Globe, it is capable of upsetting all known calculations of its flight and range. Before the Battle of Omdurman a sick officer was taken across the Nile and placed under an awning at least 5,500 yards from the nearest point of possible fire. This should have ensured him an ample margin of safety, but none the less a stray bullet ate up the intervening three miles of desert, struck him in the head and killed him.

Shortly before the Battle of Ginnis, in Sudan, General Sir Archibald Hunter, Colonel Hacket-Thompson, C. B., and another officer whose name escapes me were reconnoitering through an opening in the wall of a disused sakeeyeh, or waterwheel. The hole in the wall was so small that the officers had to stand one behind the other to see anything. The officer whose name I forget was in front using a pair of binoculars, while Sir Archibald Hunter was in the rear. The glint caused by the setting sun shining on the glass of the binoculars attracted the attention of a dervish who, together with others, was rallying along the Nile. He stopped, took aim, and fired. It was a very good shot, for it sped through one lens of the binoculars, through the brain of the officer holding them, killing him on the spot, through the shoulder of Colonel Hacket-Thompson, and finally lodged in the breast of Sir Archibald Hunter, where, I believe, it remains to this day.

The vagaries of a bullet when it touches the human frame are almost beyond relief. During another Sudan battle I saw an officer, a friend of mine, go down apparently shot through the head. To my surprise and relief I met him walking about after the battle apparently none the worse save that his head was bandaged. Then he showed me how a bullet, striking and deflected by one of the hooks of his helmet chain, had run right around his forehead, cutting a groove under the skin, and had then glanced off the helmet hook on the other side.

MODES OF THE MOMENT.

The "tailored maid" in midnight blue seems to be just as popular in June as she was at Eastertime. The sombreness of the "midnight darkness" is lightened a bit by cuffs and collars of old gold or tan and these glowing tints, by the way, are much smarter for cuffs and collars than white linen.

The Eton jacket which just touches the waist line and shows a glimpse of the blouse beneath is one of the popular summer modes. The eton suit is adaptable to cotton novelties and ratine as well as silk or serge.

Bronze pumps are not new but "everybody's wearing them." They are attractive and they suit almost every occasion.

The bride's gown no longer sweeps the ground. Dame Fashion has tucked it up to the fashionable ankle length. The 1915 bride would rather be fashionable, it seems, than sentimental.

Watch in a Pearl.

The feat of making a watch in a pearl has been accomplished by a watchmaking firm at Chaux de Fonds, Switzerland. This wonderful clock, the only one of its kind in the world, was finished a few years ago. A pearl that weighs forty-five grains and has a diameter of about half an inch contains all the works. It took an employee of the firm fifteen months to hollow out the pearl and fix the wheels. The watch is guaranteed to keep good time and may be worn as a ring on the finger.

PILES CURED at HOME by New Absorption Method

If you suffer from bleeding, itching, blind or protruding Piles, send me your address, and I will tell you how to cure yourself at home by the new absorption treatment, and will also send some of this home treatment free for trial, with references from your own locality if requested. Immediate relief and permanent cure assured. Send no money, but tell others of this offer. Write to-day to Mrs. M. Summers, Box P. 8, Windsor, Ont.

ADVERTISING.

(Pittsburg Gazette-Times)

Advertising is the connecting link between the merchant and the customer. There is not a doubt that daily advertisements, in which there is a comprehensive and specific presentation of facts, figures and commodities, are read with the same avidity as news reports and usually with greater care and a more definite end in view. Therefore, the merchant who fails to advertise is not sizing up to his real opportunities and is not alive to the first aid to prosperity.

A Military Compliment.

During the South African war an order was issued to the men of the Highland regiments that they must cover up their tartan kilts as they made too good targets for the enemy. The order proved very unpopular and caused a great deal of dissatisfaction among the soldiers concerned. When Sir George White heard this he thought of a way out of the difficulty.

"Let them cover up only the front of their kilts," he said. "The enemy will never see the other side."—London Answers.

The Trouble With Golf.

Queen Victoria once induced Count Shuvalov, the Russian ambassador, to try a game of golf at Balmoral. The Russian did try, but after innumerable misses he turned round to one of the bystanders and said:

"Ach, monsieur, it would be a very nice game if the ball was ten times larger. Now let us go home."

But what he said in Russian to himself is not recorded.

SELLING GOODS.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has for some time back been pushing a made-in-Canada propaganda. They have given the matter some publicity through the newspapers, and trade journals, but they have not yet got close to the public. They have not got down to details sufficiently to show the people why they should purchase these goods in preference to the imported article. Nor have they shown them that they would profit financially by doing so. Nor have they given the public particulars regarding the particular goods that they should purchase. We have made-in-Canada exhibitions, and so forth, but these do not impress the public to any extent. The manufacturers generally make the mistake of imagining that they have done their full duty when they manufacture the article, and get it put upon the market in the wholesale and retail stores, leaving it to the dealers to hunt for purchasers by the use of newspaper advertising.

The manufacturer should make it his business to show the public that it would be to their advantage to buy Canada made goods in preference to foreign made. Having done this, he should endeavor to prove to the consumer that the goods he makes are well worth purchasing, that for quality and cheapness they cannot be beaten. If he can demonstrate this to the satisfaction of the person who wants to buy such an article he secures his trade. If he does not make these efforts to secure custom, his real business is left to the tender mercies of the men who sell his goods, and they will look after their own interests in preference to those of the manufacturer. The man who makes the goods should be as much interested in convincing the would-be buyer that he could not do better than purchase his make as is the dealer.

BRITAIN'S NEW CRUISERS.

While Britain is losing a warship once in a while, she is taking good care to see that the wastage is more than made up. She has many destroyers and submarines waiting for a chance to show what they can do. She has new dreadnoughts of the Queen Elizabeth class, what is called [illegible]-dreadnoughts. But Britain is [illegible] building super-battle cruisers of [illegible] and power. The Scientific [illegible] speaks highly of these vessels [illegible] machines, and in the [illegible] edition of the American [illegible] to say about them [illegible] leading naval power in the [illegible] is satisfied that the battle [illegible] has fully vindicated the claims of those who were responsible for its introduction, it proved by the fact that the British Admiralty is completing four ships of this type in which the elements of speed and gun-fire will be carried such a great step in advance as to place the new ships in a class by themselves. Indeed, if there be such a vessel as a super-dreadnought, it is certain that these ships could be termed super-battle-cruisers.

We are reliably informed that this group of ships is being rushed to completion, and that the extreme features which they embody in the way of gun-fire and high speed were decided upon as the result of experience gained during the present war. They are to mount the 15-inch gun, and they are designed to steam at a sustained speed of 32 knots. The armor protection is to be of moderate thickness, necessarily. Now here we have a ship which will have the widest possible range of usefulness outside of the line of battle engagement between heavily armored dreadnoughts. Thus, if the German battle-cruisers should attempt another raid on the English coast, the 32 knot ships, if they get in touch, could easily overtake and sink them. They could catch and sink the fastest of the German scouts, and in any but the roughest weather could round up and dispose of a whole fleet of torpedo boat destroyers, whatever their speed might be. Also, if their own fleet were pursuing a battleship column, they could overtake and concentrate on the rearmost ships, thereby forcing the enemy to accept engagement—unless, indeed, the enemy admiral should leave his rear to shift for itself, as was done by the German battle-cruisers when they left the Bluecher to its fate in the North Sea battle."

Notwithstanding the gibes and sneers in certain quarters, born of ignorance, the British fleet is perhaps the most important factor in this war, and will help materially in bringing it to a successful end.

Sir Max Aitken, Canada's official eye-witness at the front, concludes his description of the battle of Ypres with these words.

"The Empire is engaged in a struggle without quarter, and without compromise, against an enemy still superbly organized, still immensely powerful, still confident that its strength is the measure of its necessities. To arms, then, and still to arms! In Great Britain, in Canada, in Australia, there is need, and there is need now, of a community organized alike in military and industrial co-operation. That our countrymen in Canada, even whose hearts are still bleeding, will answer every call which is made upon them we well know. The graveyard of Canada in Flanders is large. It is very large. Those who lie there have left their mortal remains on alien soil. To Canada they have bequeathed their memories and their glory."

Speaking of the Votes for Soldiers Act, the Canadian Military Gazette says: "And yet, it is stated there is a feeling in the Dominion that the act is a mistake. This is not a discovery made since the measure became law; the fact was realized before the bill was passed, and no one on either side of either House, it is declared, wanted it, but so completely has the wave of patriotism swept the country that, when once the bill was before Parliament no one dare oppose it for fear of being accused of being lacking in patriotism." And it adds: "It was one of those bills that once launched had to go through in some form or another, politics being what they are in this country, and it confers a presumed benefit on those who never asked for it, and who, presumably, will not highly value the gift."

THE Changeling

"I see by your looks you don't care to tell, but I shall," said Maggie, and bounding from her saddle, she ran up to Hagar, pressing her hand and whispering in her ear, that it would soon be time to hear from Henry.

"Kissed her, I do believe!" said Anna Jeffrey. "She must have admirable taste!"

Mr. Carrollton thought so, too, and with a half-comical, half-displeased expression, he watched the interview between that weird old woman and fair young girl, little suspecting how nearly they were allied.

"Why didn't you come and speak to her?" said Maggie, as he alighted to assist her in again mounting Gritty. "She used to see you in England, when you were a baby, and if you won't be angry, I'll tell you what she said: It was that you were the crossest, ugliest young one she ever saw! There, there, don't set me down so hard!" and the saucy eyes looked mischievously at the proud Englishman, who, truth to say, did place her in the saddle with a little more force than was at all necessary.

Not that he was angry. He was only annoyed at what he considered Maggie's undue familiarity with a person like Hagar, but he wisely forbore making any comments in Anna Jeffrey's presence, except, indeed, to laugh heartily at Hagar's complimentary description of himself when a baby. Arrived at home, and alone with Maggie, he found her so very good-natured and agreeable, that he could not chide her for anything, and Hagar was for a time forgotten.

That evening, as the reader knows, they went together to the depot, where they waited four long hours, but not impatiently: for sitting there in the moonlight, with the winding Chicopee full in view, and Margaret Miller at his side, Arthur Carrollton forgot the lapse of time, especially when Maggie, thinking no harm, gave a most ludicrous description of her call upon Mrs. Douglas senior, and of her grandmother's distress at finding herself so nearly connected with what she termed "a low, vulgar family."

Arthur Carrollton was very proud, and, had Theo been his sister, he might, to some extent, have shared in Madam Conway's chagrin: and so he said to Maggie, at the same time fully agreeing with her that George Douglas was a refined, agreeable gentleman, and as such entitled to respect. Still, had Theo known of his parentage, he said, it would probably have made some difference; but now that it could not be helped, it was wise to make the best of it.

These words were little heeded then by Maggie, but with most painful distinctness they recurred to her in the after time, when, humbled in the very dust, she had no hope that the highborn, haughty Carrollton would stoop to a child of Hagar Warren! But no shadow of the dark future was over her now, and very eagerly she drank in every word and look of Arthur Carrollton, who, all unconsciously, was trampling on another's rights, and gradually weakening the fancied love she bore for Henry Warner.

The arrival of the train brought their pleasant conversation to a close, and for a day or two Maggie's time was wholly occupied with her grandmother, to whom she frankly acknowledged having told Mr. Carrollton of Mrs. Douglas and her daughter Betsey Jane. The fact that he knew of her disgrace and did not despise her was of great benefit to Madam Conway, and after a few days she resumed her usual spirits, and actually told of the remarks made by Mrs. Douglas concerning herself and the plight she had been in! As time passed on she became reconciled to the Douglases, having, as she thought, some well-founded reasons for believing that for Theo's disgrace, Maggie would make amends by marrying Mr. Carrollton, whose attentions each day became more and more marked, and were not apparently altogether disagreeable to Maggie. On the contrary, his presence at Hillsdale was productive of much pleasure to her, as well as of a little annoyance.

From the first he seemed to exercise over her an influence she could not well resist—a power to make her do whatever he willed that she should do; and though she sometimes rebelled, she was pretty sure in the end to yield the contest, and submit to one who was evidently the ruling spirit. As yet nothing had been said of the hair ornament which, out of compliment to him, her grandmother wore every morning in her collar, but, at last, one day Madam Conway spoke of it herself, asking "if it were, as she had supposed, his grandmother's hair?"

"Why, no," he answered, involuntarily, "it is a lock Maggie sent me in that wonderful daguerreotype!"

"The stupid thing!" thought Maggie, while her eyes fairly danced with merriment, as she anticipated the question she fancied was sure to follow, but did not.

One glance at her tell-tale face was sufficient for Madam Conway. In her whole household there was but one head with locks as white as that, and whatever her thoughts might have been, she said nothing, but from that day forth, Hagar's hair was never again seen ornamenting her person! That afternoon Mr. Carrollton and Maggie went out to ride, and in the course of their conversation he referred to the pin, asking whose hair it was and seemed much amused when told that it was Hagar's.

"But why did you not tell me when it first came," he said, and Maggie answered, "Oh, it was such fun to see her sporting Hagar's hair, when she is so proud. It didn't hurt her either, for Hagar is as good as anybody. I don't believe in making such a difference because one person chances to be richer than another."

"Neither do I," returned Mr. Carrollton. "I would not esteem a person for wealth alone, but there are points of difference which should receive consideration. For instance, this old Hagar may be well enough in her way, but suppose she were nearly connected to you—your grandmother if you like. It would certainly make some difference in your position. You would not be Maggie Miller, and I——"

"Wouldn't ride with me, I dare say," interrupted Maggie, to which he replied, "I presume not," adding as he saw slight indications of pouting, "and therefore I am glad you are Maggie Miller, and not Hagar's grandchild."

Mentally pronouncing him a "proud, hateful thing," Maggie rode on a while in silence. But Mr. Carrollton knew well how to manage her, and he, too, was silent until Maggie, who could not refrain from talking any length of time, forgot herself and began chatting away as gaily as before. During their excursion they came near to the gorge of Henry Warner memory, and Maggie, who had never quite forgiven Mr. Carrollton for criticising her horsemanship, resolved to show him what she could do. The signal was accordingly given to Gritty, and ere her companion was aware of her intention she was tearing over the ground at a speed he could hardly equal. The ravine was just on the border of the wood, and without pausing an instant, Gritty leaped across it, landing safely on the other side, where he stopped, while half fearfully, half exultantly, Maggie looked back to see what Mr. Carrollton would do. At first he had fancied Gritty beyond her control, and when he saw her directly over the deep chasm he shuddered, involuntarily stretching out his arm to save her; but the look she gave him as she turned around convinced him that the risk she had run was done on purpose. Still he had no intention of following her, for he feared his horse's ability as well as his own to clear that pass.

"Why don't you jump? Are you afraid?" and Maggie's eyes looked archly out from beneath her tasteful riding cap.

For half a moment he felt tempted to join her, but his better judgment came to his aid, and he answered, "Yes, Maggie, I am afraid, having never tried such an experiment. But I wish to be with you in some way, and as I cannot come to you, I ask you to come to me. You seem accustomed to the leap!"

He did not praise her. Nay, she fancied there was more of censure in the tones of his voice; at all events, he had asked her rather commandingly to return, and "that wouldn't do it." For a moment she made no reply, and he said again, "Maggie, will you come?" then half playfully, half reproachfully, she made answer, "A gallant Englishman, indeed! willing I should risk my neck where you dare not venture yours. No, I shan't try the leap again to-day; I don't feel like it; but I'll cross the long bridge half a mile from here—good-by," and fully expecting him to meet her, she galloped off riding, ere long, quite slowly, "so he'd have a nice long time to wait for her!"

How then was she disappointed when, on reaching the bridge, there was nowhere a trace of him to be seen, neither could she hear the sound of his horse's footsteps, though she listened long and anxiously.

"He is certainly the most provoking man I ever saw," she exclaimed, half crying with vexation. "Henry wouldn't have served me so, and I'm glad I was engaged to him before I saw this hateful Carrollton, for grandma might possibly have teased me into marrying him, and then wouldn't Mr. Dog and Mrs. Cat have led a stormy life! No, we wouldn't," she continued; "I should in time get accustomed to minding him, and I think he'd be splendid, though no better than Henry. I wonder if Hagar has a letter for me?" and chirruping to Gritty, she soon stood at the door of the cabin.

"Have you two been quarrelling?" asked Hagar, noticing Mag's flushed cheeks. "Mr. Carrollton passed here twenty minutes or more ago, looking mighty sober, and here you are with your face as red. What has happened?"

"Nothing," answered Mag, a little testily, "only he's the meanest man! Wouldn't follow me, when I leaped the gorge, and I know he could, if he had tried."

"Showed his good sense," interrupted Hagar, adding that Maggie mustn't think every man was going to risk his neck for her.

"I don't think so, of course," returned Maggie, "but he might at least—he almost commanded me to come back and join him, as though I was a little child, but I wouldn't do it. I told him I'd go down to the long bridge and cross, expecting, of course, he'd meet me there, and instead of that, he has gone off home. How did he know what accident would befall me?"

"Accident!" repeated Hagar; "what'd befall you, who know every crook and turn of the woods so much better than he does?"

"Well, anyway, he might have waited for me," returned Mag. "I don't believe he'd care if I were to get killed. I mean to scare him and see," and springing from Gritty's back, she gave him a peculiar whistling sound, at which the pony bounded away toward home, while she followed Hagar into the cottage, where a letter from Henry awaited her.

They were to sail for Cuba on the 15th of October, and he now wrote asking if Maggie would go without her grandmother's consent. But, though irresolute when he broached the subject, Mag was decided now. "She would not run away, and so she said to Hagar, to whom she confided the whole affair.

"I do not think it would be right to elope," she said. "In three years more I shall be twenty-one, and free to do as I like; and if grandma will not let me marry Henry now, we must wait. I can't [illegible]. Rose would not approve of it, I'm sure, and I don't know Mr. Carrollton would not."

"I can't see how Mr. Carrollton's approving or not approving can affect you," said Hagar, then bending down so that her wild eyes looked full in Maggie's face, she said, "are you beginning to like this Englishman?"

"Why, no, I guess I ain't," answered Mag, coloring slightly. "I dislike him dreadfully, he's so proud. Why, he did the same as say that if I were your grandchild he wouldn't ride with me."

"My grandchild, Maggie Miller, my grandchild!" shrieked Hagar. "What put that into his head?"

Thinking her emotion caused by anger at Arthur Carrollton, Mag mentally chided herself for having inadvertently said what she did, while at the same time, she tried to soothe old Hagar, who rocked to and fro as was her custom when her "crazy spells" were on. Growing a little more composed, she said, at last; "Marry Henry Warner, by all means, Maggie; he ain't as proud as Carrollton—he would not care so much if he knew it."

"Knew what?" asked Mag, and remembering herself in time, Hagar answered adroitly, "knew of your promise to let me live with you. You remember it, don't you?" and she looked wistfully toward Mag, who, far more intent upon something else answered, "yes, I remember. But hush! Don't I hear horses' feet coming rapidly through the woods?" and running to the window, she saw Mr. Carrollton mounted upon Gritty, and riding furiously toward the house.

"You go out, Hagar, and see if he is looking for me," whispered Mag, stepping back, so he could not see.

"Henry Warner must snare the bird quick, or he will lose it," muttered Hagar, as she walked to the door; where evidently much excited, Mr. Carrollton, much excited, asked if "she knew aught of Miss Miller, and why Gritty had come home alone? It was such an unusual occurrence," said he, "that we felt alarmed, and I have come in quest of her."

From her post near the window, Maggie could plainly see his face, which was very pale and expressive of much concern, while his voice, she fancied, trembled as he spoke her name.

"He does care," she thought; woman's pride was satisfied, and ere Hagar could reply she ran out, saying laughingly, "and so you thought maybe I was killed, but I'm not. I concluded to walk home and let Gritty go in advance. I did not mean to frighten grandma."

"She was not so much alarmed as myself," said Mr. Carrollton, the troubled expression of his countenance changing at once. "You do not know how anxious I was when I saw Gritty come riderless to the door, nor yet how relieved I am in finding you thus unharmed."

Maggie knew she did not deserve this, and blushing like a guilty child she offered no resistance when he lifted her into the saddle gently—tenderly, as if she had indeed escaped some great danger.

"It is time you were home," said he, and throwing the bridle across his arm, he rested his hand upon the saddle and walked slowly by her side.

All his fancied coldness was forgotten; neither was the leap, nor yet the bridge, once mentioned, for he was only too happy in having her back alive, while she was doubting the propriety of an experiment which, in the turn matters had taken, seemed to include deception. Observing that he occasionally pressed his hand upon his side, she asked the cause, and was told that he had formerly been subject to a pain in his side, which excitement of fright greatly augmented. "I hoped I was free from it," he said, "but the sight of Gritty dashing up to the door without you brought on a slight attack; for I knew if you were harmed the fault was mine for having rather ungenerously deserted you."

This was more than Madge could endure in silence. The frank, ingenuousness of her nature prevailed, and turning toward him her dark, beautiful eyes, in which tears were shining, she said: "Forgive me, Mr. Carrollton. I sent Gritty home on purpose to see if you would be annoyed, for I felt vexed because you would not humor my whim and meet me at the bridge. I am sorry I caused you any uneasiness." she continued, as she saw a shadow fall over his face. "Will you forgive me?"

Arthur Carrollton could not resist the pleading of those lustrous eyes, nor yet refuse to take the ungloved hand she offered him; and if, in token of reconciliation, he did press it a little more fervently than Henry Warner would have thought at all necessary, he only did what under the circumstances, it was very natural he should do. From the first Maggie Miller had been a puzzle to Arthur Carrollton; but he was fast learning to read her—was beginning to understand how perfectly artless she was, and this little incident increased, rather than diminished his admiration.

"I will forgive you, Maggie," he said, "on one condition. You must promise never again to experiment with my feelings in a similar manner."

The promise was readily given, and then they proceeded on as leisurely as if at home there was no anxious grandmother vibrating between her high-backed chair and the piazza, nor yet an Anna Jeffrey, watching them curiously as they came slowly up the road.

That night there came to Mr. Carrollton a letter from Montreal, saying his immediate presence was necessary there, for a business matter of some importance, and he accordingly decided to go on the morrow.

"When may we expect you back?" asked Madam Conway, as in the morning he was preparing for the journey.

"It will, perhaps, be two months at least before I return," said he, adding that there was a possibility of his being obliged to go immediately to England.

In the recess of the window Mag was standing, thinking how lonely the house would be without him, and wishing there was no such thing as parting from those she liked—even as little as she did Arthur Carrollton.

"I won't let him know that I care, though," she thought, and forcing a smile to her face, she was about turning to bid him good-by when she heard him tell her grandmother of the possibility that he would be obliged to go directly to England from Montreal.

"Then I may never see him again," she thought, and her tears burst forth involuntarily, at the idea of parting with him forever.

Faster and faster they came, until at last, fearing lest he should see them, she ran away up stairs, and mounting to the roof, sat down behind the chimney, where, herself unobserved, she could watch him far up the road. From the half-closed door of her chamber Anna Jeffrey had seen Mag stealing up the tower stairs, had seen, too, that she was weeping, and, suspecting the cause, she went quietly down to the parlor to hear what Arthur Carrollton would say. The carriage was waiting, his trunk was in its place, his hat was in his hand. To Madam Conway he said good-by, to Anna Jeffrey, too, and still he lingered, looking wistfully round in quest of something, which evidently was not there.

"Where's Margaret?" he asked at last, and Madam Conway [illegible] "Have you seen her, Anna?"

"I saw her on the stairs some time ago," said Anna, adding that possibly she had gone to see Hagar, as she usually visited her at this hour.

LESSON II. July 11, 1915.

Solomon Anointed King.—I Kings 1, 1-2: 12.

COMMENTARY.—I. Adonijah's attempt to become King (1; 1-10). David was undertaking at the age of thirty years, and by the time he had reigned forty years he was feeble and did not have the strength and disposition to take an active part in the government. Adonijah was his fourth son but Amnon and Absalom were dead; and of Chileab no record appears since that of his birth (2 Sam. 3: 3; 1 Chron. 3: 1), therefore it is concluded that he, too, was dead, and that Adonijah was David's eldest surviving son. He was ambitious to become king, and took advantage of his father's feebleness to carry out his plans. It appears that he had not been held closely in check by his father and was prepossessing in his personal appearance (v. 6). He had prepared chariots and horsemen, and footmen to run before him, and had brought to his support Joab, David's military chief, and Abiathar, the priest. He had provided for the celebration of a great feast in the Kidron valley close to Jerusalem. He invited all his brothers but Solomon, and he left out Zadok, the priest, and Nathan, the prophet, and most of David's men of war.

II. His plans frustrated (1. 11-27). Nathan, the prophet, knew of Adonijah's insurrection, and he knew also that David had declared that Solomon should be king after him, for the Lord had designated him for that office (1 Chron. 22: 9). Hence the prophet went to Bath-sheba, the mother of Solomon, told her of Adonijah's plot, and urged her to tell the king about it, that he might declare that Solomon should succeed him in the kingdom. But Bath-sheba obtained a hearing with the king, and a little later Nathan came in and told him all that Adonijah was doing, and asked him if it was his direction that Adonijah was being made king. The prophet knew that David was ignorant of what his son was doing, and he wished to arouse him to instant action.

III. Solomon made king (1, 28-53). 28. Call me Bath-sheba—She had withdrawn from the king's presence when Nathan entered. Stood before the king—In an attitude of reverence. 29. As the Lord liveth—This was a usual form of oath or strong affirmation. Out of all distress—David recalled vividly the many distresses which had fallen to his lot, and recognized God's hand in his deliverance from them. 30. Even so will I certainly do—David remembered the promise he had made and the promise which God had given to him and was fully resolved to fulfil what he had pledged. 31. With her face to the earth—This was an attitude of reverence and supplication. Let my lord King David live forever—It was the common Eastern formula. Bath-sheba implied thereby that in her zeal for Solomon's succession there was no desire for David's death, but only that the promise made to her concerning Solomon should not be broken.—Cam. Bib.

32. Benaiah—He was a military man and the captain of David's body guard, and later became the leader of his army. They came before the king—Zadok, Nathan and Benaiah were the chief men of David's officers. 33. Cause Solomon ... to ride upon mine own mule—To ride upon the king's mule was almost equivalent to being crowned. In the Eastern mind it was an honor ever associated with that of wearing the royal apparel and the crown.—Whedon. It is said that it meant death to ride upon the king's mule without his permission. To Gihon—Scholars differ as to the location of Gihon; some suppose it to have been west of Jerusalem, and others east, not far from where Adonijah was celebrating a feast. 34. Anoint him there king over Israel—The anointing was an important part of the ceremony by which one was appointed king. It was a sign that such a person was made king, and it typified the bestowment of divine gifts upon him. Blow ye with the trumpet—To call the attention of the people to the anointing. God save King Solomon—This was to be the public proclamation of the fact that Solomon was made king. 35. Ye shall come up after him—This would denote that they were his supporters. Sit upon my throne—This act would complete the ceremony. His occupying his father's throne by his direction would mean that David handed the reins of government over to him. 36. Amen—So let it be. 37. Even so be he with Solomon—The prayer of Benaiah was comprehensive. David had been great as king in subduing the nation's enemies and in enlarging the territory of Israel, but Solomon would be still greater in extending his dominion and in wealth. 38. The Cherethites and the Pelethites—These constituted the king's body guard. 39. A horn of oil out of the tabernacle—It is clear that the oil used for anointing the priests in setting them apart for their office. 40. All the people and they rallied to the standard of Solomon. Piped with pipes—In 1 Sam. 10: 5 pipes are mentioned as being used by the prophets. They were wind instruments similar to the eastern flute. The earth rent with the sound—The rejoicing was so great that the sound seemed to jar the earth. David held a large place in the hearts of the people, but they were glad to receive that one of his sons as king whom he should designate. 41-53. Adonijah at once gave up his effort to become king and sought mercy at the hands of Solomon, who spared his life and sent him home.

IV. David's charge (2. 1-12). Just before David died he charged Solomon, who was only nineteen or twenty years of age, to obey carefully all the law and to make it a business to serve the Lord. David had received the promise that if his children would walk before the Lord in truth with all their hearts, there would always be one of their line to occupy the throne of Israel. He charged Solomon to see that the sentence of death was visited upon Joab and Shimei for their crimes, and that kindness should be shown to the sons of Barzillai, for he had aided David at the time of Absalom's rebellion. Barzillai was a wealthy and prominent man, and had furnished supplies to David and his army while they were at Mahanaim. David invited him to go to Jerusalem and live with him, but Barzillai was old and preferred to live his remaining days in his own land and to be buried with his fathers. Shimei had insulted David as he fled from Jerusalem, but had in a sense repented and greeted him when he returned to his kingdom. David refrained from having him executed, but gave direction that he be put to death later. David died after having reigned forty years and was buried in the city of Jerusalem.

Questions.—How did Adonijah seek to become king? What plan did Nathan suggest to defeat Adonijah's purpose? What did David command to be done? How old was David at this time? How long had he reigned? How old was Solomon? Who was Benaiah? What dealings had Nathan with David before this? How was Solomon received by the people? What charge did David give Solomon?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—King David's Proclamation.

I. The overthrow of intrigue.

II. The succession of kingship.

I. The overthrow of intrigue. Adonijah's declaration, "I will be king," embraced conspiracy, rebellion, intrigue, ingratitude, the defiance of a father, of a brother and of God. His ambition asserted itself with a complete disregard for the rights of others. It was nurtured in defiance of significant warning. His action suited his character. He carried to its logical issue the training which he had received in childhood. His youthful passions were stronger than his principles. His ambition was reckless and not easily thwarted. He saw with secret exultation the visible and rapid decline of his father's strength. He judged that the time had come to seize by force a crown which he could not secure by favor or procure by merit. Adonijah's ambition prompted him to an infringement of the divine ordinance, which was publicly known in the choice of Solomon; yet he influenced as many as he could to join him in his conspiracy and to aid him in accomplishing his intrigue. Nathan, the prophet, and Bath-sheba, the mother of Solomon, revealed the conspiracy, which gave the king time to avert the calamity. David still held the sceptre. He was a king to the last. He wisely and carefully marshaled the affairs of his kingdom when age and death were upon him. He did not directly attack the false kingdom of Adonijah. A few words spoken by him unseated the usurper and placed the child of promise upon the throne. David's method was wisest and surest. It not only removed an evil, but it provided for future good.

II. The succession of kingship. "I go the way of all the earth." These words express the fortitude of a soul which had found a nobler inheritance than earth supplies—a quiet composure and satisfaction, a peaceful self-surrender into the hands of the living God. In death David thought of duty. He took interest in Israel's future, and in the immediate responsibilities of his own house. He was concerned for the piety and prosperity of his son, and through him the piety and prosperity of the nation. He desired that Solomon should be nobler, better happier than he had been. He would have him avoid the errors and evils into which he has fallen. The charge delivered by Solomon to his father was deeply religious in its spirit. Not only was Solomon introduced to a throne, but the book of the law was placed in his hands, to pursue, to understand and apply. Nothing was left to his own invention. The charge was official rather than personal. Even Solomon was to remember that he had a Sovereign over him. David used no vain repetitions when he spoke of "statutes, commandments, judgments and testimonies." The whole law was to be remembered. The important aim of the charge was the right formation and development of character. During his life David had been very zealous for the Lord God of Israel. His great aim had been to keep the law. His ruling desire displayed itself in death. To him succession in piety in living and acting faith, was of greater importance than succession to the throne. He was assured that obedience to the will of God inevitably issued in prosperity in the truest sense of the word. David cared first for character, next for circumstances. He was a competent judge of manliness of character and conduct. When he advised Solomon to show himself a man, he attached no low and feeble sense to the term. He impressed the necessity of personal resolution, self-control, integrity against all bribery and corruption, and a vital identity with the enduring interests of the people. Solomon was thus exhorted to prove himself wise, valorous, virtuous and, above all, loyal at heart to God, not distorted, crooked or perverted by sin, not boastful or self-confident. Such manhood implied struggle, conflict with self, resistance of evil influences, coupled with the assurance of blessedness. The occasion was most serious, the counsel most impressive. It was an aged man addressing a young man; a king his successor; a warrior addressing a man of peace; a man of action addressing a man of wisdom; a dying man addressing one on the threshold of an earthly career. It was a father's bequest to his beloved son. T.R.A.

Could Not Bend Down On Account of Backache.

Mr. J. A. Lubiniecki, Dauphin, Man., writes: "It is my pleasure to write you in regard to Doan's Kidney Pills which I have been using for some time for kidney trouble, which used to affect my back so that at times I could not bend down, nor could I walk straight. I learned about your pills from your Almanac, and I bless the happy hour I thought of buying this medicine. One time a druggist persuaded me to buy ——— Kidney Pills, saying they were just as good, in fact he guaranteed they were. I yielded to his advice, and what was the result? I had bearing down pains in my back for two days, so I took the balance of the pills unused to the druggist, and told him to give me Doan's Kidney Pills as they would stop the pain in 12 hours at the outside. He told me he was sorry I did not use more of the pills, and lengthen the time, to await results. I told him there is no need of waiting with Doan's Pills, they go right to the spot. No substitute for me."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c. a box, 3 boxes for $1.25 at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. [illegible] the elements entering into its conflict and the [illegible] from the causation of hostilities have been [illegible] in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE'S editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front [illegible] placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the women's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

In a naval battle in the Baltic on on Friday, the Russian squadron defeated the German warships, sinking and badly damaging several of them.

Germany declared war on France on August 3rd, 1914, eleven months ago. As Great Britain declared war on Germany the following day, August 4th, this is the 339th day that the Empire has been at war.

Pope Benedict, in conversation with the former Secretary of the French Embassy at the Vatican, urges France to believe that his neutrality is not indifference. He condemns German atrocities concretely.

The casualties to date in the overseas Canadian expeditionary force now number 9,717. They are growing at a rate of about one hundred a day and promise to soon pass the 10,000 mark. The killed number 1,613, wounded 6,375, and missing 1,729.

The wrecking of a room in the Washington Capital on Friday last is claimed to have been caused by the explosion of an infernal machine. Recently more of these episodes have occurred in the States than in Canada and the ultimate result will probably be that our southern neighbor will soon be drawn into the conflict.

Speaking of the conduct of the Canadians during recent fighting in Flanders, an officer expressed his opinion as follows:—

"I cannot say too much in their praise. You can have no idea of how highly we regard them When ever there is an exceptionally difficult piece of work to be done, the Canadians are called for."

J. P. Morgan, the multi-millionaire, was shot at his home in Glen Cove, New York, on Saturday by Frank Holt, German lecturer at the Cornell University. Morgan is the financial agent of the British and French governments in America and Holt in his statement after his arrest blamed the great financier for the continuance of the war. Although Morgan received two bullets from the fanatic's revolver his wounds are not of a serious nature.

TO CARE FOR WOUNDED.

Senator J. A. Lougheed has been appointed president of a commission to look after the sick and wounded who return to Canada from the front during the progress of the war. The new commission will be known as the "Hospital Commission" and its principal work will be the care of those who have suffered in the cause of the Empire. A check on the expenditure of public funds, which will necessarily be very heavy, will also be kept by the commission. Homes for those convalescing will be provided and hospitals equipped.

MAPLES AS MEMORIAL TO CANADIANS.

Canadian maples will flourish over Canadian graves in Flanders Large supplies of Canadian maple seeds have been forwarded to the Overseas Club, London, whose organizer Evelyn Wrench, is now negotiating with the British Red Cross to plant these seeds wherever practicable around the graves in cemeteries where Canadian soldiers are buried in France and Flanders. The Overseas Club proposes after the war to plant an avenue of maple trees at St. Julien as a memorial to the Canadian dead.

CANADA IN THE LIMELIGHT

Canada is very much in the limelight these days, and the halo of glory that now encircles her name will remain. This war, with its tremendous issues and consequences, will throw all other wars into the background. It affects the whole world and every nation, whether or not it is actually in the field. The great thing that sustains the Allies is that they know what they are fighting for and that is nothing less than the cause of right and freedom. Canada shares in the defence of these great and everlasting principles and has displayed in ample measure the qualities that built up, and now sustain, the British Empire, whose proud boast it is that more than other world empires, it is maintained, not by the power of the sword, but by loyalty, based on the rule of law and liberty. Nothing has been more surprising to foreign writers on the Empire than the manner in which the Dominion and the native people have rallied to the flag. It has impressed even Britons themselves, and its effects will be great and far reaching.

A Sudden Death in Drayton

A very unexpected death took place at the R. C. Presbytery, Drayton, the residence of Rev. Father Arnold, on Saturday, June 26, 1915, when the Very Rev. J. J. Gehl of Formosa, dean of Bruce County passed away as the result of a severe attack of appendicitis. He came to Drayton the middle of last week and accompanied Rev. Father Arnold in his car to St. Clements, Waterloo County, to attend the funeral of the latter's mother. After the funeral he returned to Preston on Friday to pay his brother, Rev. Father Gehl Jr., a short visit. While there he complained of feeling unwell from symptoms of appendicitis, but expected it would shortly pass away, and made the return trip with Father Arnold, reaching Drayton that evening. Before they reached here the attack had become greatly aggravated. Dr. Flath was called in attendance, and later Dr. McCue of Formosa, and Dr. Sinclair of Walkerton were sent for, who came as quickly as possible and an operation was performed by the latter at once. On making the incision it was found that the appendix was gangrenous and the prospects for recovery were considered exceedingly doubtful. However everything possible was done to relieve the intense suffering and spare the life of his Reverence; but his work was done and the tolling of St. Martin's church bell a little after 5 o'clock Saturday evening announced that the end had come and Rev. Father Gehl had been translated to his eternal home. Enclosed in a beautiful oaken casket the remains were conveyed to St. Martin's church, whither a large number of all denominations went on Sunday to view the happy face and fine physique of a priest called in the very midst of his busy life work. Requiem High Mass was sung on Monday morning at [illegible] o'clock by deceased's brother, Rev. Father Gehl of Preston, in the presence of [illegible] and with the assistance of St. Martin's Church choir, which rendered very appropriate music. After the service the sacred remains were taken to the [illegible] [illegible] Formosa, where the funeral took place on Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock. Rev. Father Gehl was born in Waterloo County, and spent the first eight years of his 30 years of priesthood at St. Clements, in his native county and the last 22 years as pastor of the charge at Formosa, near Walkerton, where he was greatly beloved by a very large membership, and [illegible] [illegible] community. Object to Sending Tobacco.

A little bomb was unexpectedly "tossed into the camp" at the patriotic meeting Monday evening in the Methodist church, when at the conclusion of an address by Miss Arnold, in which much was said of tobacco, one of the ladies in the audience, who has a son in the trenches, rose to remark that she thought much of the money contributed for soldiers' comforts could be spent to better purpose than in the purchase of tobacco and cigarettes. She felt that the movement would tend to popularize the use of the weed and that many of the boys would be induced to acquire the habit of smoking in this way, adding that she wouldn't thank anyone for furnishing her son with cigarettes in the face of what had been said by the speaker. It couldn't have been an easy thing for the lady to do and she is certainly deserving of credit for taking the stand which she did. But what else could any W.C.T.U. women consistently do? and there were many of them in the audience. Here they have been fighting the cigarette evil for years and this movement to furnish soldiers with a wholesale supply of cigarettes bids fair to more than undo all their work of education along this line.—Listowel Banner.

SHARP ATTACK REPULSED

Dangerous Condition Relieved Just In Time By "Fruit-a-tives"

MR. F. J. CAVEEN
632 Gerrard St. East, Toronto.

For two years, I was a victim of Acute Indigestion and Gas In The Stomach. It afterwards attacked my Heart, and I had pains all over the body, so I could hardly move around. I tried all kinds of medicines but none of them did me any good. At last, acting on the advice of a friend, I decided to try 'Fruit-a-tives'. I bought the first box last June, and now I am well, after using only three boxes. I recommend 'Fruit-a-tives' to anyone suffering from Indigestion, no matter how acute". FRED J. CAVEEN.

Simple Indigestion often leads to Heart Attacks, Catarrh of the Stomach and constant distress of mind and body. If you are bothered with any Stomach Trouble, and especially if Constipation troubles you, take 'Fruit-a-tives'.

50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c. At all dealers or sent postpaid by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

Mrs. Charles Fox of Walkerton, was visiting Mr. and Mrs. Edward Fox, last week.—Kincardine Review.

The formal opening of the Canadian National Exhibition will be on Monday, August 30th, at 2.30 p. m.

A neighboring editor sarcastically remarks that he wants to buy a sack of flour, a pair of shoes and a straw hat, and he is ready to receive the bids for the same. He states that some of his town merchants do treat him this way when they want two dollars' worth of printing done.

A few days ago a libering man in Wiarton with a family spurned a job at $1.75 and refused to work unless he was paid 20 cents per house. This seems incredible, but the fact remains that a great many employees do not realize what the employer is up against this year. For a man like this there is absolutely no sympathy, but there is pity for his wife and family.

Appointed Expert Judge

Mr. Andrew Schmidt of Carrick has been appointed by the Ontario Government a judge in the Standing Crop competition. Worse Than Gas.

Edison the man who invented the phonograph, says in a recent interview that he favours peace, but if the United States is forced into a war with Germany which seems inevitable, he has an invention more deadly than gas to destroy life with which he will give to his country when the time comes. It is supposed to be an electrical invention in connection with the wireless system that will explode the enemies ammunition with rays that can be sent many miles by an operator from a concealed position.—The Canadian Camrose Alberta.

$33,000 Extra Taxes.

Mr. S. J. Parker, Grey county treasurer, read the estimates at the Co. Council session last week for the year, pointing out that the county will have to raise $100,000 owing to the extra one mill on the assessment for war taxes. This will mean a levy of about $33,000 in war taxes from the county payable to the Provincial Treasury over and above the amount that will be required for carrying on the business of the county. This will be about $67,000 or about the same as was required last year for county purposes This increase in the estimates is entirely due to the war levy.

The Mills of Justice.

Magistrates Quinn and Mackenzie fined Constable Joseph Armstrong of Kinloss $10 and costs for trespass and Wm. McKenzie of Bruce $5 and costs for assaulting Wm. Munroe, $3 and costs for assaulting George Munroe, and $2 and costs for assaulting Neill Munroe. The charges arose out of a visit paid to the Munroe home by Armstrong and McKenzie to recover a dog which it was claimed to belong to McKenzie. It was alleged that they had been drinking liquor before they went to the Munroe home and another charge was laid against them on that count. It was tried before Magistrates Quinn and Woods at Tiverton, and they were each fined $20 and costs. —Kincardine Review.

Auto Crushed Motorcycle:

The most exciting episode on race day occurred up town about 7. p m when the crowd that had been in. was beginning to disperse homewards. Mr. Leslie Winch rode out from the Central Hotel yards on his motorcycle and started north. On the middle of the Teeswater bridge he was overtaken and thrown from his machine by an automobile driven by Mr. S. Bricker of Listowel. Those who saw the accident expected there would be nothing left of the cycle rider except his lifeless body, but he pulled out of his mix-up with nothing worse than a bruised leg. The motorcycle was caught under the auto and ground along until the car came to a stop. A good deal of repairing will be required to again make it a reliable outfit. Mr. Bricker we understand, offered to settle for the damages.—Paisley Advocate

Pte. Cole Wounded.

Wounded in the neck and head, according to a telegram received by his father, Peter Cole, last Saturday. George was in the Battle of Festubert in which so many casualties occured. Like others from here he was among the first to volunteer and left Chesley last August with the First Contingent Geo. is a real Chesley boy for he was born in this town 18 years ago. He is a capital shot and if he had the opportunity to draw a bead on a German be sure pinked him. His father expects word shortly giving particulars of the wounding of his son. As the telegram says the wounds were about the head and the neck they are likely serious enough. However we will all hope for the best that this brave boy who is fighting in distant France may return to Canada in good health having faithfully done his bit for the British Empire.—Chesley Enterprise.

The Western Fair

The Western Fair of London, Ont, as an Agricultural Exhibition occupies a prominent position in Western Ontario, and throughout the whole Dominion. This will be the forty-eighth Annual Exhibition without a break, and every dollar of prize money won during that time has been paid. The management has been increasing the prize list from year to year and this year through the assistance of the Dominion Government they are enabled to add over $1,000 to what was already a liberal list. Live Stock Breeders should avail themselves of the privilege of Exhibiting this year in larger numbers than ever. Exhibitors always report good results from showing at London; as buyers are plentiful, The Dairy and Poultry Departments, will be of special interest this year. If a prize list, entry form or any other information is required about the Exhibition write the Secretary, A. M Hunt, London, Ontario. The dates are September 10th to 18th.

Duncan Ross, Dead.

A despatch from Victoria, B. C. dated July 1st., says:—"Duncan Ross member of the Dominion House of Commons from 1903 to 1908 for Yale Cariboo, died suddenly last night. The late Mr. Duncan Ross was born in Bruce County, Ontario, on May 15th 1870. He was a son of a farmer and was brought up on the farm and received a county school primary education, subsequently attending the Kincardine High and Model Schools, from the latter of which he graduated at the age of 17. In 1890 he went to British Columbia and for four years taught in the public schools of Victoria. He then became connected with the Victoria Times, the Liberal newspaper owned and edited by Mr. William Templeman, and for some years was a member of its reportorial staff. In 1897 he moved to Greenwood at the time the excitement over the discovery of large bodies of minerals caused a rush to that district. At Greenwood he purchased an interest in The Boundary Creek Times which he edited for some years. After serving as Alderman at Greenwood for four years he was, in 1901, selected by the Liberal convention of Yale Cariboo as candidate for the House of Commons for that constituency. He sat through one Parliament. Prior to the election of 1911 he organized the Liberal forces in Yale and Kootenay riding. During the past two years Mr. Ross has had a sub contract on the western line of the Grand Trunk Pacific and has resided in Prince Rupert. He was a Presbyterian in religion.

The old pastime of horse back riding has passed away in this section of Ontario. Perhaps one of the reasons is that there are few decent riding horses in the community. The government horse buyers remarked on the scarcity of horses fitted for cavalry use. The farmers have gone in for the heavy horses and it looks as if the automobile would crowd the light horses off the road altogether.

Two Autos Collide.

Two autos collided on Friday evening on Queen St. North and both cars were badly wrecked. Reuben Wittig was the driver of one car and Meredith Hunter was driving the other. They did not manage to get out of each others way and the crash that followed smashed axles and lamps and gave the occupants a shock. Arthur Smith was sitting with Meredith Hunter. Both escaped injury, but Miss B. Greaves and Miss L. Morrison were thrown out of the rear seat and injured but not seriouly. They were able to be around next day. Wittig was unhurt.—Kincardine Review.

Successful Paisley Girl.

Alberta's first lady lawyer is a native of Paisley, Miss Lillian Ruby Clements, B. A., of Vegreville. In the final law examinations in Alberta this young lady was among the list of those who passed and qualified for the bar. When these graduates are formally admitted to the Bar as practitioners in September next Miss Clements will also receive the degree of LL.B from the University of Alberta, having taken the extra course entitling her to that honor. This clever young women is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs Wm. Clements, formerly of Paisley. She graduated in 1912 from McMaster University and studied law in Vegreville. —Paisley Advocate.

America Shares Sorrow

The list of Canadian dead in the second battle of Ypres climbs higher and higher. In all—of dead, of wounded, of captives—the list has already risen above 6,000. The dead already reported greatly exceeds the entire loss of the American army and navy in the Spanish-American war. By the latest statement, 700 Canadian officers and men were killed, and 3,000 wounded: and the report is yet far from complete. In 1898 the American losses in the entire Santiago campaign were twenty-three officers and 247 men killed, and ninety-nine officers and 1,332 men wounded. The total losses of the Spanish war in the American army, in killed and wounded, were twenty-three officers and 257 enlisted men killed, and 113 officers and 1,464 men wounded. The deaths from all causes, including in action and disease, in the whole American army (maximum) of 274,717 men, from May 1898 to June 1899 were 6,619. Canada has already suffered much higher ratio of loss in its much smaller contingent. It is estimated that at Ypres one-fourth of the 21,000 in the Canadian division were put out of action. In the Canadian loss America shares, not only in poignant sympathy, but in a manner more direct. Canada has always been and still is, a great recruiting ground for American industrial and professional activity. The Canadian of the eastern provinces upon reaching the age of manhood, generally looks either to the United States or to the Canadian northwest as the scene of his activities. Reared frugally, trained to industry, strong and vigorous, with a clever brain inherited from a staunch race, the young Canadian is always a valuable addition to our country. Probably there is not a community of any consequence in all the United States, from Maine to California, from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico, that has not its prominent citizens of Canadian birth. Brain, muscle, heart and spirit that would have gone to the making of America—how many of them will be left on those bloody plains of Belgium! —From the National Police Gazette, published at New York.

Safe and Timely Investments

At no period in our experience of over a quarter of a century, have there been so many new investors in Government and Municipal debentures as during the past six or seven months.

This is due to the fact that these securities constitute the safest class of investment, and that owing to present financial conditions, they are now obtainable at most advantageous prices. They are readily resaleable and are being constantly purchased by such discriminating investors as Banks, Insurance, Loan and Trust Companies.

Our latest list contains full particulars of such high-grade debentures as:

The Columbia Trademark on a COLUMBIA RECORD

Is as true a mark of quality as the Sterling mark on silver.

The making of a Columbia Record is an artistic truimph.

Every shade of a vocal expression and every variation in tone is faithfully recorded and reproduced.

The same holds true in reproducing instrumental music.

In the records of such famous selections as Tschaikowsky's Overture 1812, one can distinguish the notes of every instrument at any moment, even in the most tremendous passages.

Reading Advertisements

NEWSPAPERS would be much less enjoyable, instructive and valuable than they are if they contained no advertisements. Many persons read the advertisements quite as thoroughly as they read the news matter. This is just as it should be.

The more advertising, the more buying. The more buying, the greater consumption of the goods or service advertised.

More business would be done by the merchants of Walkerton if they advertised more, and if more of them advertised. Much business goes to the big city mail-order houses because they advertise. These houses would cease to draw business from this community if they ceased to advertise.

To the Merchants of Walkerton

Advertise more, and more of you advertise, and the big city mail-order houses will get less and less business from this community and you will get more.

Old Country News

ASKS HALF AVAILABLE RECRUITS.

London Cable.—(Correspondence of the Associated Press)—Lord Kitchener has asked for half of the available recruiting material of the United Kingdom for his newest army. He wants to raise an additional 300,000, and an analysis of census statistics indicates there are not over 600,000 men left in the United Kingdom to draw on, if the industrial needs of the country are taken into consideration.

Army estimates for February provided for 3,000,000,000 men. These, and perhaps more, are serving. According to the Daily News, it would take another million to cover the navy, the armed auxiliary vessels, the mine sweepers and applicants to the army rejected as physically unfit. Lloyd George is authority for the statement that 2,000,000 civilians are employed in the manufacture of equipment and munitions and in their transport. Another 1,500,000 comprising policemen, firemen, officials, seamen, miners and laborers, keep the civil life of the country going. Great Britain, therefore, is employing a grand total of 7,500,000 men.

The last census gave the United Kingdom 8,100,000 men of military age which is between the years of 18 and 40.

Deducting the soldiers and sailors now serving and those previously rejected, together with the necessary civilian war and industrial workers, there are only 600,000 men of military age left out of which to raise the new army of 300,000.

The advocates of the volunteer system say this can be done. Conscriptionists are as yet a small, if noisy, minority.

Kitchener has been severely criticised at times for his recruiting methods, but in one instance at least, he knew more about his business than the public. When in the early days of the war he raised the physical standard from 5 ft. 4 in. to 5.6, newspaper critics told him that this was an age of science, and not of brawn, and the little man proved the best fighter by reason of being able to live on less food and to take cover easier in action. But Kitchener was then facing the problem of clothing, equipping, feeding, quartering and drilling the new men. From a normal peace issue of 245,000 pairs of shoes a year to the British army, the order was immediately jumped to 6,500,000 pairs; suits of woollen underclothes from 111,000 to 7,000,000; 250,000 uniforms to 5,250,000, and other supplies in proportion. Besides, training grounds and quarters had to be prepared and officers found to drill the men.

To shut down on the supply of recruits until those accepted could be cared for, Kitchener raised the size limit, which he has gradually reduced to 5 feet 2 inches for the bantam battalions.

The fact that England has managed to accomplish all this without conscription is the chief argument of the upholders of the volunteer system.

CANADIANS FOUND DOG SPY.

Wounded Canadians in hospital at Cardiff tell a story of how a nest of spies were discovered in Northern France. Somewhere near the billets and firing line there stood a coffee house inhabited by five people, including a boy. The troops on their way to the trenches used to call for refreshments, and the occupants consequently had exceptional opportunities of obtaining valuable information and always had a fairly good idea of the strength of the forces holding the section of the trenches.

The Germans in that part seemed to be well informed of what was going on in front of them. Regiments arriving unexpectedly and without even the knowledge of the regiments in the trenches were hailed by name by the Germans. The coffee house was suspected, but continual search revealed nothing.

Once a soldier heard a conversation in German, but again a fresh search revealed nothing. At length the boy gave away the secret, and it was discovered that a dog had been used to carry messages to the German trenches. The Canadians had often seen it wandering about the trenches and had petted it unsuspectingly.

Messages were carried underneath a false coating of fur ingeniously wrapped around the dog. Now dogs found wandering near the trenches are immediately shot.

SINKING TO RAGTIME.

A corporal of marines, who was on board the Irresistible when she was struck by a mine in the Dardanelles, says the Central News, wrote to a friend describing the sinking of the ship.

"We unfortunately struck a mine," he wrote, "and began to sink, which the Turks could see, and they peppered our poor old ship with shells as we were going down. How we escaped being blown to atoms I don't know.

"Everything went off grand, and the amusing sight was to see all hands blowing up their swimming collars. On the quarterdeck the bluejays were dancing the bunny hug and singing ragtime songs to mouthorgan accompaniments."

CAXTON'S NURSE

By Elizabeth Woods

When I was in the medical department of the British army in India and stationed at Hong Kong I was sent to an interior station to see a young officer, Lieutenant Caxton, who was ill. I found the lieutenant in the house of a widow with a very pretty daughter. He was ill, but intermittently, for at times he was quite able to be up and about. When he was confined to his room the young woman had the care of him.

The thought entered my head that perhaps Caxton was shamming in order to remain in close proximity to the girl, but I was soon convinced that he was really ill. His symptoms not being familiar to me, I did not know what to do for him except to give him a stimulant drug quinine to keep him there [illegible] what was troubling him. But he did not improve, and I was puzzled what next to do.

I had some experience with Indian poison cases, though not much, and if Caxton had not been in the care of a girl who treated him with such tenderness that I could not doubt she was in love with him, I would have believed that for some reason or other she was poisoning him.

Talking one day with the widow, I learned that they were not natives, Indians, but had come from Java. It then flashed upon me that I had heard that a Javanese girl who loved a man will either have him or kill him. This gave me a key to Caxton's case.

From that time forward I watched his nurse's every movement. I also told Caxton of my belief that his nurse was in love with him. He confessed that he had begun to suspect as much himself, and that he had occasionally treated her with more consideration than he should have done. I asked him if he had noticed that he was better at such times, and he said that, come to think of it, he thought he had. From this I surmised that [illegible] his lapse she resumed administering her poison doses.

My problem was to discover if she was really poisoning him, and if so in what way. In most such cases the drug is administered in the food. I succeeded in getting samples of the food the patient was taking at times when he was in a low condition and analyzed them, but I could not find the slightest trace of anything that would not have been taken. Eastern races are famous for their methods of poisoning, and I had during my service in India gathered some information regarding them. I therefore kept my eyes open, with a view to discovering some other way in which Caxton's nurse was working on him, if she was doing so at all, of which I was by no means sure.

I suggested to him to get out of the house, but he said there was no hospital for him to go to and he was receiving much better nursing than he would in his quarters. I saw that I would not be easy to make a change, and the only other was for me to do my best to solve the puzzle of his illness.

A common way of administering poison in countries where it is much used is by wearing a finger ring. A person wearing one will clasp the hand of another, and a minute point pricking the skin will inject a poison. I noticed that Caxton's nurse wore a ring on her finger and suspected that she gave him doses in that way. I pretended to admire the ring and asked her to let me examine it. She handed it to me without hesitation, and I looked it over very carefully. No poison was administered in that way. The ring was perfectly plain gold, and if there had been any poisoning apparatus, however minute, I would have discovered it.

Another Indian method of imbibing poison is through the air. It is even breathed and sometimes exhaled from a perfume. There are persons in India who have taken a deadly poison in minute doses, gradually increasing them till the poison takes, have become immune to harm and so saturated with the drug that their very breath is deadly to others. I shuddered at the idea of Caxton's nurse being one of these. But after contriving to get so near her for a few minutes that I could take her breath, I felt an internal [illegible] [illegible].

Seeing a plant in Caxton's room I told his nurse to take it out, since the perfume of flowers is considered harmful to invalids. She obeyed, and after that I did not see it in the room again till one morning I went in to see Caxton before it was [illegible] for the day. There I saw the plant and asked him how it came to be there, contrary to my instructions. He informed me that his nurse was accustomed to bring it to his room before leaving him for the night and taking it away the first thing in the morning.

I at once pounced upon this as containing a solution of the puzzle. I had heard of the poison plant in India and had only needed only to breathe its perfume to be affected by it. Picking a flower from it, I took it away with me and put myself voluntarily under its influence to convince me that it was being used upon Caxton.

I at once informed him of the fact, and he was glad to return to his quarters, where, as soon as the deleterious effects of what he had been relieved to passed off, he recovered.

But we never let the girl know that we had discovered her method of procedure.

Little Girls' Gowns Will be Just Like Grown-Up Ladies Dresses

There will not be much gingham worn this year, even in children's frocks. The manufacturers, however, have made many cotton weaves into gingham patterns.

While the new loosely woven ratines will probably not wear as long as gingham, they are softer and prettier than standard material for children's frocks.

Brown and yellow plaid ratine makes a smart school frock for a little girl eight to ten years old. The skirt is perfectly plain, somewhat gored at the belt, and the waist is cut in kimona shape, left open in front to show white cotton duvetyne waistcoat. The collar and cuffs are of handkerchief linen, hemstitched.

Most children will wear the low stretch "baby doll" slippers this summer and white stockings will be worn to the exclusion of any other color.

ROMANCE OF RARE STAMPS

Not a little of the fascination which the study and collecting of postage stamps holds for enthusiasts lies in the fact that the story of their origin and subsequent history is in many cases of an exceedingly romantic character.

The single known copy of the rarest stamp in the world, valued at $10,000—the one-cent British Guiana issued in 1856—was discovered by a young collector in the colony among some old family papers stored away in an attic.

Knowing nothing of its scarcity, and not being favorably impressed by its appearance, he sold it to another collector for a trifling sum, the purchaser being also ignorant of the great bargain. Ultimately it found its way to Europe, and now remains in the collection of M. Phillippe de la Renotière, of Paris, who purchased it many years ago.

The value of $7,250 is placed upon the famous "Postoffice Mauritius" stamp, which was crudely engraved on a small copper plate by a local watchmaker of Port Louis and issued by Sept. 21, 1847. A total of only 500 copies of each of these stamps were [illegible] printed at one of an time from the plate, and the majority of these were used on invitations for a ball sent out by Lady Gomm, wife of the governor of the colony.

It was not until many years afterwards [illegible] of these [illegible] found by a young stamp collector in Bordeaux. The most perfect used copy of the 2d. Postoffice Mauritius was sold by auction in 1904 and is now included in King George's collection.

To the story of the watchmaker who designed this stamp may be added that of the baker's boy who engraved a stamp of the republic of Corrientes, now forming part of the Argentine Federation.

In 1855 it was decided by the authorities to issue stamps but they could find no engraver to cut the die or prepare the plates. While one of the officials was discussing the situation with the head of the state printing office on his veranda one morning a baker's boy arrived with the daily supply of bread, and, overhearing the conversation, volunteered to undertake the work, stating that before emigrating to South America he had been apprenticed to an engraver in Italy.

Ultimately the boy was given the work to do, and he turned out a stamp which, although crude, served for all the postage stamps issued in Corrientes from 1855 to 1880.

Probably few people are aware of the fact, by the way, that King George of Britain (then Prince of Wales) was responsible for the design of the 1903 postage stamps of Canada, universally acknowledged to be the most artistic stamps of the last reign. About the time of the late King's coronation the postmaster general of Canada, then on a visit to England, took the opportunity of consulting his royal highness on the subject of proposed new issue of postage stamps for the Dominion.

The prince at once took the keenest interest in the work, designed the stamp in conjunction with a member of the Royal Philatelic Society and superintended the preparation of the plates in England. The Edwardian stamps of Canada can therefore lay claim to the distinction of being designed by a king.

A stamp around which centres one of the ugliest political crimes of modern history is the so-called "death mask stamp" of Serbia, issued in 1904 to commemorate the accession of King Peter I. The dastardly assassination of King Alexander and his Queen, Draga, by military officers on June 11, 1903, wiped out the Obrenovitch dynasty from the throne of Serbia and paved the way for the present King.

Mr. [illegible], one of the most famous of French stamp engravers, was commissioned to prepare a stamp from a design by a Serbian artist, showing on a single plaque the twin heads of Kara George, the founder of the dynasty which bears his name, and King Peter, his descendant.

The stamps were issued at the time of King Peter's coronation, in 1904, and hardly had they got into circulation when it was discovered that the death mask of the late King Alexander had been skilfully and subtly introduced into the design and, on the stamp being inverted, could be plainly traced in the reversed features of the two heads.

This discovery at once caused an outcry, the stratagem being ascribed to Queen Nathalie, mother of the murdered king, and her supporters, but all significance in the plot was indignantly repudiated by the engraver, and the mystery of this extraordinary happening has never been satisfactorily cleared up.—London Strand.

Out of the Mouths of Babes.

Teacher—"Did you ask your mamma what a spinster was?"

Little Johnny—"Yes, ma'am. She said am woman that was married says it."

"Harry," said the teacher, "can you tell me what animal attaches himself most to man?"

"Yes, ma'am," answered Harry. "The tumble."

"Come, Bess," said the mother of a little four-year-old miss, "it's getting late and you should be upstairs in bed."

"But, mamma," protested the little one, "it won't be any earlier up there than it is down here."

Little Mary's mamma had promised to take her to see a moving picture show on a certain afternoon, but circumstances compelled her to change her plans. "Oh, dear!" sighed Mary, "I do wish I had a mother that wouldn't be such an unfaithful!"

You never can tell. Many a man who does a lot of talking about his mansion in the sky never mentions the mortgage he carries on it.

Chats With the Doctor

BY A PHYSICIAN

FITS.

There are a great many different kinds of seizure, popularly described as "fits." That is the medical vocabulary. If you pass beyond that to other uses of the word you get many more; such as "a fit of bad temper," "a fit of the sulks," "a fit of religious mania" and I know not what beside.

You often hear of a "fainting fit," technically termed syncope. That may be due to a weak heart or to anything such as tobacco, at the first which temporarily weakens the heart's action. It may be due to powerful emotion; but one does not hear much of that kind nowadays. A century ago the heroine of the popular novel was always fainting at every opportunity and usually she had fainted about a dozen opportunities before the novel ended happily. One never reads of a heroine fainting now. Possibly those of the former generation succumbed too readily because they wore exceedingly tight stays—a strong impediment to efficacious action of the heart. And the more athletic young lady of the present era does not.

FAINTINGS.

Whenever anybody faints in this way from a temporary heart failure, the first thing you have to do is to place the patient in a recumbent position, with the head lowered—hanging down over the edge of the bed or sofa. That quickly revives them without anything else. A favorite method with doctors for restoring animation to people under chloroform is absolutely to turn them upside down, with the heels in the air, and the head touching the ground.

Then of course a little sal volatile may be administered to the lady; the gentleman usually prefers brandy or whiskey and water. Also you may dash cold water in the face. That provokes a deep breath, and then prompt recovery. The novel heroine of old, if I remember right, had her stay lace cut and feathers burnt under her nose.

EPILEPTIC FITS.

But sometimes what passes for a mere "faint" is not really so; but it is the polite term for a very mild attack of epilepsy—what the French call petit mal. There is not a failure of the heart; the whole thing involves a momentary convulsion, a nerve storm, in fact. In the epileptic there occur sudden and violent discharges of nerve energy, exactly parallel to the discharges of electricity in a thunderstorm, and hardly less mysterious in their origin or in the causes which lead up to them.

Epilepsy is usually hereditary, and has been inherited from an ancestor, though sometimes accidents, such as a fall on the head, may generate the tendency to occasional convulsive attacks. The severer forms are a terrible affliction, ending usually in mental disorder. Often the malady is from the first associated with insanity. The degrees of severity vary from convulsions frightful to witness, down to a transient headache, or dimness of vision. The disorder known as "sick headache," migraine, or megrim, is nearly related to epilepsy. That is one form of the "diabolical possession" recorded in the New Testament.

When a person falls in an epileptic fit he or she should at once be placed in such a position that no harm can be done to them by the convulsions. Anything tight about the neck or chest should be loosened. Even if the patient is in bed, there should be careful watching. They have been known to suffocate themselves with the bedclothes.

Bromide of potassium or bromide of ammonium in doses of half a teaspoonful twice a day, dissolved in a tumblerful of water, has considerable influence in diminishing the frequency of the seizures. But this can only be taken for limited periods at a time; otherwise the salts are apt to bring out a rash, the bromide rash. Dilution by a large quantity of water tends to prevent the eruption. The general health requires attention and constipation is always to be carefully warded off.

It is rather curious that while epilepsy tends usually to weaken the mind, and many epileptics are from the beginning deficient in intellect, some of the greatest men in history would seem to have been liable to seizures; e. g. Socrates, Mohammed, even Napoleon.

HYSTERIA.

Here is another term of art, popularly ascribed to women in the main—and about which in some respects perhaps the least said the better. I think there is a genuine hysteria, in which the emotions overpower the reason, and for the time the patient is overwhelmed by what the irreverent would describe as "an uncontrollable fit of temper." The old-fashioned remedy was a pailful of cold water soused over the head and face. In obstinate cases our ancestors resorted to the ducking-stool. Sal volatile in doses of half a teaspoonful to a teaspoonful freely diluted is the staple medicine—if medicine be wanted. But I am not at all sure that this form of hysteria is often met with. The descriptions you read in medical treatises are vague and indefinite. They apply more correctly to another feature, which is fashion aptly termed "hysteria." That is simply intoxication. When a lady of some position in society has taken too much to drink, the malady is put down by her friends and the medical attendant as "hysteria." A great many things in this world are masquerading under the right name. It is a world of "Make Believe," and I suppose always will be.

A great many of the symptoms put down as "hysterical" are, moreover, due to quite another source, to a morbid craving for sympathy, or for excitement in one form or another. Many women in hospitals will do anything to procure an operation which them will make all sorts of complaints. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] case they have heard anything about. I remember one woman under my care of course in a hospital who had laid in bed 20 years, and obstinately refused to get up on any account. It is a vexed question whether the hydrophobia, or rabies of old—the malady due to bite by an animal supposed to be mad—was not really an affection of this kind, due merely to imagination and imitation. It is now happily extinct in this country.

GYMNASTICS.

For all troubles of this latter class, and for a great many others which are described as nervous ailments, plenty of open air and exercise form nature's approved remedy or preventive. They are the two factors which should keep us all—whatever our age or condition in sound health and vigor.

But well regulated exercise of certain muscles or sets of muscles, for a certain period of each day is much better than mere walking about, and most people who want to preserve health would do well to seek out and adopt some form of gymnastic exercise. The best I know consists in swinging, etc., on the horizontal bar. Its special virtue lies in relieving the spine-muscles of the weight of the trunk, which otherwise they have to sustain in the erect position—as when you resort to dumbbells.

Then rowing, cycling, swimming and many more like pursuits [illegible] suggest themselves. Those [illegible] afford it will ride, not, how[illegible] motor car or on a motor-[illegible]. Was it not Lord Palmerston [illegible] marked that the outside of [illegible] was the very best thing for [illegible] side of a man?

CAN YOU ANSWER?

If Not, Expert Says You Are "Feeble-Minded."

Could you answer the questions that Dr. William J. Hickson of Chicago's psychopathic laboratory says are easy for children 8, 11, 12 and 14 years old?

Dr. Hickson, solely on his own conclusions, has established the moral and mental standing of about 200 people within the last year.

The assistant state's attorney who is investigating the doctor's methods made him produce the questions he asked a 17-year-old girl whom he declared to be feeble-minded. From her answers he rated her as having the mentality of a child 11 years old.

Here are some of the questions he asked her, and her answers.

"What is charity?"

"Where you get something for nothing," answered the girl, and she was given a rating of zero.

Q.—What is justice?

A.—Go before a judge and tell the truth. (Wrong.)

Q.—Is it easier to forgive any one if he struck you in anger or otherwise?

A.—God forgives us when we fight. (Wrong.)

Q.—What are the three chief differences between a king and a president?

The girl was unable to answer this one.

Q.—What is the opposite of false?

A.—Face. (Wrong.)

Q.—What is the difference between laziness and idleness?

A.—They are the same. (Wrong.)

Q.—If you saw a doctor, a lawyer and minister going into a house what would you think had happened?

A.—Somebody died. (Correct.)

Q.—What would you do if you missed a train?

A.—Wait for the next one. (Approved.)

Q.—If you were on your way to school and found out that you were late, what would you do?

A.—Go right along, [illegible] [illegible].

Luring the Bees.

The Arabs and the Bedouins of [illegible] [illegible] profit by the industry of bees [illegible] vegetation abounds. At the swarming season empty hives are placed close to the old ones, and a trail of honey laid at each entrance. If a queen is disposed to fly away with her subjects, lemon rind is rubbed on a wall near the hive, the quickly diffused, pungent odor attracts the bees, arrests their flight and the hive of the [illegible] at the portal completes their capture.

Her Baby Had Dysentery.

Had Two Doctors. No Result.

WAS CURED BY THE USE OF

DR. FOWLER'S

Extract of Wild Strawberry.

In dysentery the discharges from the bowels follow each other with great rapidity, and sometimes become mixed with blood.

Never neglect what at first appears to be a slight attack of diarrhoea or dysentery will surely set in. Cure the first symptoms by the use of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry.

Mrs. Martin Farraher, Docherty Corner, N.B., writes: "I can very strongly recommend Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry for dysentery and summer complaint. My little girl, at the age of two years, had the dysentery very bad. We had two doctors, but with no result. My mother brought me a bottle of "Dr. Fowler's," and when half the bottle was used the little girl was running around playing with her dolls with great delight and joy to the family, for we did not think she would ever get better."

There are a number of preparations on the market to-day, claiming to be the same as "Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry," and also called similar names, so as to fool the public into thinking they are getting the genuine.

"Dr. Fowler's" is manufactured only by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont. See that their name is on the wrapper.

Price, 35 cents.

Was Weak and Run Down.

COULD NOT STAND THE LEAST EXCITEMENT.

When you are weak and run down the heart becomes affected, the nerves become unstrung and the least excitement causes a feeling of utter lassitude. What is needed is to build up the heart and strengthen the nerves by the use of such a remedy as Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills.

Mrs. J. A. Williams, Tillsonburg, Ont., writes: "I cannot speak too highly of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. I suffered greatly with my nerves, and was so weak and run down I could not stand the least excitement of any kind. I believe your Heart and Nerve Pills to be a valuable remedy for all sufferers from nervous trouble."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers, or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

RAISING SQUASHES FOR MARKET.

Squashes can be raised with less hand labor than any other vegetable. They can be grown as a second crop after peas, early cabbage and any vegetable that can be marketed before July 15.

Squashes can be scored until a profitable market is open, for these reasons they are a favorite crop with market gardeners. It is an excellent crop to raise on land not in suitable condition for market gardening, or in orchards where the trees are small or so scattered as not to overshade the crop. Squashes will always fail to give satisfactory returns if planted in turf land by cutting out a circle two or three feet in diameter and manuring liberally. But they can be successfully grown in tillage land badly infested with twitch grass if the cultivator is so frequently used as to torment this pest till it gives up the ghost.

In the manure pile and cultivator lie hidden the squash crop. Freshly-broken turf is preferable, such land being less infested with bugs. For the yellow varieties of running squashes, the lighter soil of the farm is preferred; for the darker-colored, such as Hubbard, Delicious and Bay State, the heavier soil, but it should be free of clay. Plow in spring as deep as good soil goes and apply the manure, full ten cords to the acre, and the surface, and wheelbarrow in until the surface is as fine as possible to make it.

In making the hills, furrow and cross-furrow, have them eight feet square for the yellow varieties and nine feet for the dark ones. Excavate a shallow hill where the furrow crosses and throw a heaping forkful of rich manure into each. Draw the earth over it, so that the seed, when planted one and a half inches below the surface shall be a little above the general level. Plant eight to ten seeds, and just before runners show, thin to three plants, scatter the seeds well over the hill when planting.

As soon as young plants begin to break ground scatter over them some good bug protector, such as plaster, with a little paris green well mixed wit hit. Disparene is excellent. This protects from the yellow-striped bug. The most effectual way to dispose of the large brown or stinking bug, is to stick pieces of an old shingle, slanting toward the ground, about each hill. Go out in the morning and crush those that have taken shelter there during the night.

One good hand-hoeing close to the hill is all the crop should need, the cultivator run both ways close to the hills doing all the needed work. Keep the cultivator active, especially just as you begin to see signs of runners, for after that, in a very few days, the vines will take ground and it will be too late. If a runner is interfered with by the cultivator it will be apt to be rolled over by the first high wind, and the crop from it will amount to nothing.

The king of squashes to raise will depend on your market. If you have one in your vicinity, or they may be shipped by the carload. Crops vary from five to eighteen tons per acre. For the earliest market the Dunlap Marrow, with its varieties, is a favorite. For the late fall market the Warren is excellent, and for winter and spring markets the Hubbard and Bay State are favorites.

For family use for fall and early winter none to compare with the Delicious, as hundreds who have enjoyed it well know. This does not crop quite as heavily as most sorts, but its superior quality should insure its bringing an extra price, sufficient to fully offset the difference.

For keeping purposes, handle your squashes like eggs. Pile them two deep, having plenty of air in your squash house until too cold; then keep the thermometer about 40 degrees.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

For footrot in the sheep flock there is nothing better than this treatment: Pare away all dead hoof and apply blue vitriol, nitric acid and red lead, equal parts, mixed.

Science indicates that one may plant and care for his crops with every method known to man, but if the seed is not good the crop will fall short of expectations. More depends on the seed than most of us realize. We think that proper cultivation will work a miracle out of anything we plant. It will not. Get good seed first, and then give it all the advantages.

Work horses should have very little hay at morning or at the noon feed. Plenty of grain is better, and their greater service will compensate for the extra grain allowance.

It is very provoking to have a horse on the farm that is shy and hard to catch. The trouble is often the result of improper training when the animal is young. Kindness is necessary in order to break a horse of this habit. Never hit him when he is caught. A good plan is to feed him something every time he is caught. It is a good plan occasionally to bring the horses in from pasture and put them in the barn when there is no work for them to do. It requires a good deal of patience to cure a horse of shyness, but it pays.

Noise has a frightening effect on some horses, and simply an exciting effect on others, especially on the trained ones, who, being well mannered, remain under control whatever may be their feelings in the matter.

Butter made from cream which has been allowed to remain too long before being churned never keeps well; in addition to this, its flavor is never what it ought to be.

"Fertilize the soil, not the crop," is the slogan of the soil fertility experts of the College of Agriculture, Ohio State University. They say it is a mistake to talk about a "corn fertilizer" and "wheat fertilizer." Experiments have shown that an application of phosphorus on some soils, for instance, will largely increase the yield of every crop grown, and not only the one immediately following application. All crops will be good, say these men, if the soil is supplied with the elements of plant food which it lacks.

A cow with a tail that reaches the ground
Given plenty of milk the year round;
Also the cow with a forehead wide
And a slender neck and a thin, soft hide
Hips that are large and an udder low,
So little light is seen below;
These are the signs that often tell
The cow that likes to give milk well,
But better than forehead, hip or tail
Is the proof she gives you at the pail.

Grass is nature's feed for the horse, and it seems cruel to keep a workhorse up in a hot barn when he could just as well be out in the cool night air browsing grass. Another thing we like to see is to have a horse take a good roll after a hard day's work. Have you ever noticed that the first thing a horse will do after being turned out is to roll? It always seemed to us that a good roll is to a horse what a bath is to a man. If they are kept up at night, it is best to allow them at least an hour or two in an open lot during the evening.

ECZEMA WAS CURED TWELVE YEARS AGO

Dr. Chase's Ointment Proved to be a Permanent Cure.

The old idea of eczema being a disease of the blood has been pretty well exploded by the record of cures made by Dr. Chase's Ointment.

Some doctors still advise internal treatment, but the results are slow and uncertain, and too often a lamentable failure. With Dr Chase's Ointment it is different. You apply the ointment to the sore parts. It cleanses the sores and soon sets up the healing process. In a few days you can see with your own eyes the wonderful change that is taking place, and are encouraged to keep up the treatment until the cure is complete and the sores replaced by smooth, natural skin.

It is wise to look after your general health, keep the bowels regular and the blood rich, but you can depend on Dr. Chase's Ointment to cure the eczema if you will do your part and apply it regularly.

Mr. W. H. Roberts, Charlottetown, P.E.I., writes: "I can recommend Dr. Chase's Ointment to anyone suffering from itching skin disease. I had eczema on my leg and suffered terribly from the itching. I had a doctor treat me for four months without relief, and I was getting worse all the time. A second doctor gave some relief for a time, but made no cure. I tried several advertised treatments but without relief, until I used Dr. Chase's Ointment. This ointment cured me in a month. That was twelve years ago, and I have never had a sign of the old trouble since.

"Since then we have always kept Dr. Chase's Ointment in the house, and find it invaluable for chafing, chilblains, insect stings and burns. I would not be without it if it cost $5 a box."

"This is to certify that I am personally acquainted with Mr. W. H. Roberts, and believe his statement regarding the use of Dr. Chase's Ointment to be true and correct."—(Signed) Alex. Horne, Justice of the Peace.

McKIM'S, 1915

New Edition of Canadian Newspaper Directory is Out.

It is now nearly a quarter of a century since Mr. A. McKim, who established the first independent Advertising Agency in this country, completed the rather ambitious task of publishing the first Directory of Canadian publications. The nine successive editions of this valuable work provide the most complete and detailed record available of the growth of Canadian periodicals.

The 1915 edition, of which we have just received a copy, shows that the great war has not seriously affected the newspapers of Canada. While the birth-rate of new publications has received a check, and the death-rate of weak ones has perhaps increased a trifle, most of the leading papers, particularly the dailies, show very healthy increases in circulation. Three metropolitan dailies have reached or passed their hundred thousand mark.

A census of the papers listed and described in the 1915 Directory shows nearly 160 dailies, 7 tri-weeklies, 46 semi-weeklies, over 1,065 weeklies, about 40 bi-weeklies or semi-monthlies, 250 monthlies, 3 bi-monthlies and 18 quarterlies—a total of over 1,675 publications.

This means approximately one daily to every 10,000 families, and one weekly to every 1,590 families. From this one would infer that for a comparatively new country, Canada is well read.

A. McKim Limited report the usual keen demand for the Canadian Newspaper Directory, which sells at $2.00. Its red-banded, gold-stamped green cover has become a familiar sight on the desks of advertisers, publishers and business men everywhere who are interested in Canada.

DISGRACED THE SENTINEL

For Not Killing the Army Chief Who Had Struck Him.

In France in the seventeenth century the office of sentinel was a very solemn charge, and a part of the sentinel's duty was to resent and punish any affront. The severity of this punishment was in proportion to the high importance of his office. A Frenchman relates an incident illustrative of this fact.

In 1622 M. de Marillac rode away on horseback from an audience with the king. His horse stepped on a sentinel's foot. The man struck the horse, which leaped forward and shook M. de Marillac in his saddle.

The rider turned and struck the sentinel. The soldier belonged to the company of M. de Gesse, who when he heard of this had him arrested and imprisoned. He himself set out, sword in hand, in search of M. de Marillac to demand satisfaction for an insult to his sentinel.

The king was informed of the incident and sent for M. de Gesse and M. de Marillac. He reprimanded de Marillac severely, told him that the sentinel should have killed him and forbade him to exercise his command as chief marshal for six days.

The sentinel was tried before a council of war and was sentenced as a penalty for not killing De Marillac to be deprived of his arms in the presence of his regiment and to be tortured by the strappado—that is, to be hoisted by a rope to a beam and let fall. The king pardoned the man, but M. de Gesse would not have him in his company again.—Washington Star.

The fellow who curses his luck because he never has any must be a sort of human paradox.

The Wonderful French Housewife

Mabel Potter Daggett tells the following in writing about the French housewife in Pictorial Review for July, 1915.

She is coming down the Rue Delambre and the Rue de la Gaite, the Rue Poinsot, the Rue Stanislaus, and the Rue d'Odessa. In either hand she carries a capacious filet, the string bag that is to Paris what the market basket is to the provinces. And these long hurrying lines of her are converging on the market that has this morning unfolded its fluttering white canvas covers beneath the locust trees where the white oilcloth stalls are set five deep down the length of the Boulevard Edgar Quinet. There are other streets, too, where you might see her. Every quarter of Paris has a market like this for two days a week. And she is always there.

Solomon, writing some thousands of years ago, might have had her in mind, so well does the description apply: "She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her." And well it may. It is she who holds the national bas de laine, the 'stocking' that is said to contain the wealth of France. This, of course, is a figure of speech. Quite likely it may as often be in a teacup on the pantry shelf or in the corner of a bureau drawer or in the bottom of a trunk in the attic. But the point is that somewhere she puts it away. She does this through saving thrift and her careful economy—because she is French. See her here this morning buying in the Boulevard Edgar Quinet.

At home in New York, as in the cities all over the American continent, there are to-day ten thousand housewives and more, who also are doing their marketing. But many of them are doing it in a kimono and a lace-frilled boudoir cap, with no more exertion than taking down a telephone receiver. What is the price per pound of the lamb chops that Madame Manhattan is ordering? Really, she has never troubled to inquire. Does she know that there is a shortage in peas to-day that has made them jump in price? And that peaches this month are costing twice as much as they will next? But these are details in domestic economy that she has very likely wholly missed. A voice at the other end of the wire "sends them over," and "charges it." Presently there is the butcher's boy and the baker's boy and the grocer's boy calling up the dumb-waiter shaft, and a succession of packages has arrived on the kitchen table. The marketing for the day is done—until the maid remarks that she "forgot, but the breakfast bacon is out."

"Oh, well, just call up." A little later she remembers that "We need soap."

"Oh: well, call up." And perhaps afterward she comes in to say that "The cake isn't going round for dessert." In the course of time, there will be the butcher's boy and the baker's boy and the grocer's boy all coming whistling down the street again. And they don't come for nothing. That, too, gets charged in the bill. Though Madame never, never heard of such a thing.

For every dollar expended by the American housewife on food for the home table, twenty-five cents goes to pay for transportation. Seven hundred million dollars' worth of food stuffs are consumed annually in New York City, and that means a cost of one hundred and seventy five million dollars for transportation. All of it isn't for railroad freight. Some of it is for the grocery wagon that is always running up and down the street every time a housewife happens to think of something else. In Paris there is no delivery wagon running up and down this boulevard for these housewives with a filet in either hand. They carry home their own packages. It helps to keep down household expenses.

NEWSPAPERS IN INDIA.

They Seem to Be Run in a Happy-Go-Lucky Sort of Way.

Americans, accustomed to the hustle and bustle of our newspapers that are enterprising to a marvelous extent, would be amazed if not exasperated with the papers of India. One of these sheets recently published this explanation:

"This is only the beginning of our paper. We were not sure how much matter was required to fill it up, and, thinking we had sufficient, we did not exert ourselves much to get any more. We therefore beg that our readers will excuse us for the space left blank and promise to do better and get more in the future."

How many subscribers would that paper have in this country? Still more curious was the announcement of a paper that came out with two columns blank, the editor having the cheek to say that a large quantity of exceedingly interesting matter has been left out for want of space.

When the average East Indian editor wants a holiday he suspends publication until it is convenient to resume and, taking the public into his confidence, informs them plainly why the paper was not issued on the expected dates. "With the consent of our readers we now propose to take our annual holiday. We are sure none of them will begrudge us our relaxation."—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

THE POULTRY WORLD

SUMMER HATCHED CHICKS.

There is profit in summer hatched chicks if they are carefully and economically raised.

Where one has a large, old orchard he has an ideal spot for raising summer chicks, and an excellent way is to set hens right under these trees in barrels laid on their sides with a lath run in front. After the hatch is over the barrels can be cleaned out, new soil thrown in, and the hen and her brood can make this their home until large enough to be moved to other quarters. On this shady range the youngsters will not mind the heat, and they will secure grass and insects galore. Everything else being equal, chicks are bound to grow rapidly under such circumstances.

Where the old orchard is not available a cornfield will serve the purpose. After the corn is about three feet high the coops can be scattered about the field, same as in the orchard.

Now where the land is limited, where the old orchard does not exist and the cornfield would be out of question, in fact where the territory is very limited and where natural shade is not extensive, canopies can be erected, practically only a roof supported by four strong posts, one in each corner. This contrivance should be not more than two feet high, and since there are no sides, the cool air will come through, if there is any air at all. Shade is one of the greatest factors in raising summer chicks. Without it failure is sure to come.

Next in importance to shade comes fresh air. Begin right. Grow the chicks out in the open. Housing in close-fitting coops at night will not successfully raise summer chicks. Where there is danger of night prowling animals it is best to have the fronts of these sheds composed of one-inch wire netting. This will keep out the enemy, but allow plenty of fresh air.

The diet of summer chicks is practically the same as that for winter chicks excepting that less corn (a heating food) should be allowed in the ration. There must be some corn, however. Put in just enough to balance the ration. The three grains important for chick growth are wheat, oats and corn—in the proportion (in summer) of two parts cracked wheat, two parts oats (either cracked, hulled oats or oatmeal) and one part finely cracked corn, all by measurement. These are mixed and placed in boxes within easy access. After the chicks are a few weeks old give them a mash composed of two parts bran (by weight) to one part each of middlings, ground oats, cornmeal and meat scrap. Of this only enough is given each morning that the chicks will eat up clean. One of the greatest dangers is to allow mash to stand around to sour. Sour food kills hundreds of chicks annually, and too much care cannot be given to prevent this loss.

NOTES.

This is chick weather. Cool nights, warm days, and now and then rain to dampen the soil and make grass tender and natural essentials that go much toward making rapid and strong growth in the chicks.

Strange how many beginners fail to heed the advice of known experts in poultry. A few years of experience, however, puts the beginner right. Yet time and money could often be saved if the advice of those who have made good in poultry was heeded.

There is yet much to learn in poultry. Our best experts do not know it all, but the foundation has been laid for successful poultry and the advice given by those who have and are making good should be carefully considered.

The better the care the chicks receive the more rapid the growth and quicker maturity to the producing of eggs for the winter markets. A well-grown chick from good stock is a profit-payer.

The utility question is at its height. Now watch for the reaction, not that utility is not a good thing to have in the flock. In fact, it is the first consideration, but the claims made by some so-called utility is almost a crime against the American fowls. If it were not for the name, one on seeing them on the farm would call them common scrubs. All shapes, all sizes and looking anything but like the breed or variety they are named after. The only recommendation they have is the name utility, and that means to some only egg production.

TRACING COUNTERFEITERS.

The Secret Service Agents Have a Splendidly Effective System.

Some time ago one of the local banks caught during the day a counterfeit ten dollar bill. It was such a clever counterfeit it would pass anybody but an expert. The next day ten or fifteen more of the bad bills were found in the city.

Then the government's machinery to protect its currency began to work. But there was nothing mysterious about its working. In the office of the secret service here an official sat all afternoon smoking and looking at specimens of counterfeit currency. Huge clouds of smoke rose from his pipe. That kept up all day. The reader of detective tales who believe the secret service works in a mysterious way would have been distinctly disappointed. But at last the pipe dropped from the lips of the man sitting at the desk in the federal building with a whole pile of greenbacks infront of him. He took up two bills and compared them carefully. Then he studied them again, noting every little curve and characteristic mark. He stepped to the telephone and called the United States prison at Leavenworth.

"Was James Ward, alias Stewart, alias Nolan, in prison?"

No. James of the two aliases had been out six months. Then telegrams went out to certain officers in certain cities. How they located James Ward the government keeps as a secret. Later the counterfeiter was arrested at Springfield, Ill., and his outfit for raising bills was found with him.

And so another counterfeiter was caught and put out of business. How was it done? Simple enough—if you belong to the secret service. Every counterfeiter has some distinguishing characteristic in his work, some little curve or break in a line that gives him away. The secret service agents compared the new counterfeit with dozens of old counterfeiters. At last he found the telltale distinguishing characteristic. And the rest was easy.

James of the two aliases and a counterfeiting device had served three terms before. So there was plenty of his samples.—Kansas City Times.

IMPROVED HIGHWAYS

The Hon. G. F. McDiarmid, Minister of Public Works and Highways in the Ontario Government, has issued a pamphlet containing much information concerning the new Act dealing with the improvement of the public highways. It says that the whole scheme of highway development has been conceived on broad lines. There are two main classes of roads, namely, county or market roads and township roads. It is chiefly for the benefit of these classes that the Government programme has been designed. The Highway Improvement Act was originally passed in 1901, was consolidated and revised in 1907; important amendments were introduced in 1912, and the new Ontario Highway Act passed in 1915. The general basis is as follows.

1. A county council is authorized to assume a system of roads for construction and maintenance.
2. A by-law adopting such a system may be passed by a two-thirds majority of a county council, representing at least one-half of the equalized assessment of the county.
3. Failing to receive a two-thirds majority of the county council, it may be carried by a simple majority of the council, and confirmed by a majority vote of the ratepayers.
4. The roads assumed are to be such as will accommodate the greater part of the local market travel, creating a system of main market roads.
5. The roads are to be built in accordance with the regulations of the Department of Public Works and Highways.
6. The direction and superintendence of the work is placed in charge of a county engineer or capable superintendent appointed by the county council. A committee of the county council should co-operate with, advise and direct the road superintendent.
7. The system of roads assumed and the by-law fixing the plan of improvement are subject to approval by Order in Council.

When considering the adoption of a county system or the framing of a by-law, the county council should communicate with the Department of Highways in order that their plans may be prepared in accordance with the requirements of the Act. The cost of roads varies with local conditions. The mileage of roads assumed also varies, but is usually from 12 to 15 per cent of the total road mileage of the county. Gravel roads are commonly built at a cost of from $1,000 to $2,500 per mile; broken stone roads from $2,500 to $4,000. The length of wagon haul is an important factor.

Suburban roads, for the most part, are sub divisions of the market roads. They are simply market roads entering the larger cities and to which the cities should contribute. The classification of suburban roads is a means of assisting the farming communities to build their market roads by calling upon the cities to pay a fair share of the cost. This is rendered all the more necessary now that traffic from the cities takes advantage of the county road systems for motor travel, both for pleasure and commerce.

To promote the construction of county or market roads the Government under the new legislation has increased the amount of the Provincial contribution from 33 1-3 per cent. to 40 per cent. of the cost of construction. Having regard to the importance of maintaining such roads to a high standard, and to insure a proper system, Government will pay 20 per cent of the cost of maintenance, and this provision is made to extend to any county that has adopted a by-law under the Highway Improvement Act.

With regard to suburban roads, the Act provides that upon application of any county roads the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall direct the appointment of a commission to determine suburban areas to be served by a proposed system of suburban roads, such commission to be selected by the councils of the city and county. The board so appointed shall be empowered to lay out and construct the roads which shall continue to be county roads under the jurisdiction and control of the county council, the work to be under the supervision of the county engineer, but subject to the direction of the board appointed for that purpose.

The expenditure upon roads within any suburban area shall be borne as follows: 30 per cent by the county, 30 per cent. by the city or town, and 40 per cent by the Province; but the amount to be contributed by the city shall not exceed the proceeds of a rate of one-half mill on the dollar of the assessment. The expenditure for maintenance and repair shall be borne by the city and the county in the ratio of 40 per cent each, the Province paying 20 per cent. Where the population is over 50,000 the commission shall consist of five persons, two each from the city and county, and one by agreement as before.

The Act provides that a township council may appoint a road overseer or foreman, who shall under the direction of the council, lay out and supervise all work and expenditure on roads within the exclusive jurisdiction of the township council, and the Province will pay 25 per cent. of the salary for three years of such overseer or superintendent up to $600 per year.

In a system of highways, main or interurban roads form an essential part. Under the Act the petition of three-fourths of the municipalities interested in the construction of a main road will enable a start to be made. When in the opinion of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, it is in the public interest to build such a road, a board of trustees of five members shall be appointed. The Minister may procure for the board a report by the Engineer of the Department on the proposed work, with plans, specifications and estimates, together with a suggested distribution of cost, and the board may proceed with the work making such revision of the estimates as may be necessary after hearing representations from all parties interested.

As in the case of other roads, the Province will contribute to the cost to the extent of 40 per cent., but in any event the Provincial grant shall not exceed $4,000 per mile. The moneys required for the repair and maintenance of any such main or interurban road shall be levied by the board annually on the various municipalities involved in the proportion set forth in the approved report of the Engineer of the Department, and these moneys shall be a debt of the municipal corporation due the board, and shall be payable at such times as the board may determine.

To prevent the unsightly marking of the landscape with sign boards, power is given to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, to make regulations for the erection of signs or other advertising devices, and for fixing a fee to be charged for erecting any sign or sign board or other advertising device, and this same power is to be exercised by road if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council so directs. Widespread complaints have been made of the defacing of the roadside in other communities by the erection of unsightly advertising devices, and to prevent the nuisance gaining a foothold in Ontario this provision has been deemed advisable and timely. At the same time a system of licensing advertising signs would produce a revenue for road maintenance.

WHY YOUNG GIRLS GROW PALE AND WEAK

The Blood Supply is Deficient and Unless the Trouble is Remedied Consumption May Follow.

When girls grow weak, pale and miserable, then is the time for parents to take prompt steps. Delay means danger—perhaps consumption. The girl in her teens cannot develop into a happy robust woman without an abundant supply of rich, red blood in her veins. It is the lack of this good blood that is the great trouble with nine girls out of every ten. They grow weak and depressed; lose their appetite are breathless after the slightest exertion, and suffer from headaches and backaches. When girls are in this condition there is no medicine can compare with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. In the use of these Pills there is splendid vigorous health, with glowing cheeks and sparkling eyes, for every unhappy, fragile girl who is struggling on to womanhood in a wretched state of health. This is why thousands of girls and women, now robust and attractive, are constantly recommending Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to their suffering sex. Miss Edith Brousseau, Savona, B. C., says: "At the age of fourteen I became very anaemic. I was as pale as a ghost, suffered from headaches, severe palpitation. I had little or no appetite, and seemed to be drifting into a decline. I was attending high school in Vancouver at the time, and the doctor advised me to stop. I did so and took his treatment for some time, but it did not help me in the least. Upon the advice of a friend I began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and in a very short time they gave me back complete health and enabled me to resume my studies. I have enjoyed the best of health since, and owe it all to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

These Pills are sold by all medicine dealers, or may be had by mail, post paid, at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Paddled Away in a Coffin.

Several men have succeeded in escaping from Devil's Island, where Captain Dreyfus was confined. One bold prisoner escaped from his cell during a dark night and forced his way into a shed where coffins were made. Selecting a large shell, he nailed the lid down in such a way that a hole was left big enough for him to crawl into. Then he raided a storehouse and stole a supply of food, which he placed inside the coffin. His next proceeding was to drag the coffin and its contents down to the water's edge. Reaching it in safety, he launched his sepulchral vessel, crawled into it and paddled away by means of his hands. Devil's Island never saw him again.

There is a railway system in the United States that traverses thirteen of the States, and that employs 250,000 persons, who, in turn, contribute to the support of 1,000,000 kinsfolk. The daily wage and salary bill is $500,000, and the daily revenue from passenger and freight traffic is twice that sum. In terms of tonnage and mileage the record for freight carried in one year is as if one ton were shifted 35,000,000,000 miles from the point of departure; in terms of passenger service it is as if John Doe, of New York, were carried 4,500,000,000 miles.

Another interesting literary discussion has arisen with regard to the authorship of "The one Fishball." The words—and they have been attributed to many eminent in letters—are likely to pass before the lines shall have vanished from college student tradition.

The waiter to him he doth call
And gently whispers, "One fishball."
The waiter roars it through the hall,
The guests all start at "one fishball."
He says again, quite ill at ease,
"A piece of bread, too, if you please."
The waiter roars it through the hall,
"We don't give bread with one fishball."

PRIVATE ARMIES.

Gaekwar of Baroda Controls More Than 9,000 Men.

Although technically legally forbidden, there are several people in this country who, with the approval of royalty, either tacitly or openly expressed, keep private armies. The best known of these, perhaps, is the Duke of Atholl's Highlanders, numbering over 200 men of all ranks, which has furnished at various times guards of honor to King George as well as to his father, while many years ago it was publicly reviewed by Queen Victoria, who presented to it a new stand of colors.

The officers as well as the men of the Duke of Atholl's private army are recruited entirely from among the tenantry of his estates, and the present moment practically all of them are serving as regular soldiers at the front in one or other of the Highland regiments, mostly in the Black Watch.

The majority of the Duff Highlanders, the famous private bodyguard maintained by the Duke of Fife, are also fighting in France and Flanders. A peculiarity of this private army is that in peace times the corps, which numbers 100 men, are still armed and uniformed exactly as were their forefathers three or four centuries ago.

The marquesses of Donegall have for centuries kept up a show of both military and naval strength on their Irish estates, which include Lough Neagh, the sheet of water, the largest in the British Isles, the reigning marquess for the time being is hereditary lord high admiral. The present holder of the title, it is interesting to note, succeeded to it in 1889, when only about a year old, and he is, at the same time, without doubt the youngest admiral on record.

Quite an imposing army is that maintained in Borneo by Sir Charles Brooke, better known as Rajah Brooke of Sarawak, the force being made up of about 400 natives under an English command.

Mention might also be made of the private armies maintained by Indian tributary princes, beginning with the Nizam of Hyderabad, who pays, feeds and clothes a splendidly drilled and magnificently equipped force of [illegible] picked warriors, to private armies composed of no more than ten or a dozen men, which comprise the bodyguards of the chiefs of the tiny statelets scattered in the forests of Central India.

So far as actual numbers go, it is perhaps the Gaekwar of Baroda who owns the biggest private army in the world. It numbers in all 9,000 men. The Maharajah of Mysore, too, has a big army of 1,000 men, which, like those of other Indian princes, has been placed at the service of Britain in the great crisis.—Tit Bits.

Wood Engravings.

The better wood engravings are made almost exclusively of boxwood, and the large blocks are made of small pieces glued together. The engraving is done across the end of the grain. Japanese wood prints, on the other hand, are made on lengthwise sections of cherry wood parallel to the grain.—Argonaut.

Summery Dress Stuffs

The new arrivals are cotton voils and new raw and Shantung silks. The weaves are beautiful, even and fine as silk. Good wearing and washing quality. These materials are very correct. The shades in voiles are cream, tuscan, pink, pale and Alice blue, also white. Per yard 25c, 35c, 40c and 50c.

Keeping Robins off

Hang a few tiny bells on the tips of the slender branches of the cherry tree they will help to frighten the robins away, so it is said.

Killed in Explosion of Bombs

The following letter was receive by the wife of a woodstock soldier being written from the firing line somewhere in France, and gives a brief description of the death of Capt. Fitz Robinson, formerly of this town who was killed in action at the battle of St Jullien.

Yesterday I attended the funeral of Col, Becher, Lieut. James, of Woodstock, Robinson of Strathroy, and three other officers. They were buried side by side, wrapped in blankets, but uncoffined. They now rest in a cemetery near the firing line. While the bodies were being carried to the cemetery, German shells were flying in the vicinity. Lieut. James was killed by his bombs. There was an explosion in the trench he was in, a portion of the trench fell in on the bombs which exploded killing him, together with Robinson of Strathroy and others, who were blown to pieces.

Walkerton 4, Teeswater 7.

The Teeswater baseball team retaliated for the defeat administered to them by the locals on their own diamond recently by coming to Walkerton on Thursday evening last and defeating the home team right in their own back yard by a score of 7-4. The game was an excellent exhibition of baseball and although the visitors won by a good margin, the match was more even than the score indicates, the majority of Teeswater's runs being secured by their ability to hit at the opportune time This win for Teeswater puts the teams on an even footing for the district championship and to win the district the locals must duplicate their former performance and defeat their opponents in Teeswater on Friday of this week when the last game of the schedule will be played.

Declared Insane.

Chief Ferguson made a trip to Greenock on Saturday and arrested Anthony Hiehn on a charge of being insane and brought him to gaol. Hiehn appeared before Magistrate Tolton on Monday evening and on the strength of the medical examiners report and evidence which was taken he was declared insane and was lodged in gaol to await his removal to the asylum.

$900.00 in Fines.

A very interesting liquor case was tried in the police court on Saturday before Magistrate Jas. Tolton when three Hanover young men, Hube Fink, Fred Gibbons and John Himmelspach were found guilty on a charge of selling liquor without a license and were fined $300 and costs each amounting in all to $950.00. The case arose from complaints made be citizens of Hanover with regard to the houseboat on the Saugeen below that town which was claimed to be a veritable saloon and which it has been stated had brought about the ruination of many of the town's young people, and the weekly jollification and hilarious parties on the Sabbath on board it had become decidedly annoying to the better living people of the town. The complaints were first made to the Hanover authorities, but as the boat was in Bruce county they were powerless to act and finally Inspector White was appealed to. He at once took steps to have the grievance removed and in the early hours of Sunday, June 27th, at 3 a.m. to be exact, he in company with Chief Ferguson and Constable Beamish of Hanover raided the structure and found thereon three eight-gallon beer kegs, one empty, one full and the third almost full. In the boat were the three young men who were later subpoenaed to appear in court on Saturday. At the trial which commenced at 10 a.m. and was not concluded until late in the afternoon, the evidence produced was such that the magistrate convicted the trio and imposed the fine of $300 each. To the average person this is a decidedly heavy fine, but it is the minimum which can be imposed in such a charge. The case was somewhat complicated, and Mr. A. G. Tucker of Owen Sound who appeared on behalf of the defendants has given notice of an appeal. Mr. O. E. Klein appeared for the prosecution.

Beggar Arrested

James Stewart, a one armed beggar, struck town on Thursday and made the rounds of the town soliciting alms Many had compassion on him and shelled out a few sheckles, but Stewart like many of his kind displayed his gratefulness by getting drunk on Friday. He made himself obnoxious to citizens on main st. and was finally gathered in by Chief Ferguson. Stewart was taken before the magistrate who remanded him until Tuesday noon to shake the dust of the town from his feet. It is fellows of Stewart's calibre who spoil the chances of deserving alms-seekers when they strike town.

Fall Into Mill Race.

Miss Mary Gateman a Hanover young lady who was spending a day at the home of Mr. Schauss, had a narrow escape from drowning in Truax's head-race on Sunday evening. The young lady was walking across on a timber at the head gates when she stumbled and fell headlong into the stream. Fortunately the power was not being used and there being no current her companions were able to catch hold of her, one by the hair and the other by the dress and managed to pull her to shore. She crawled to terra firma and beyond being in a sorry plight was little the worse for her experience.

Clothes Found on River Bank.

The local police have yesterday and today been endeavoring to clear up the mystery which surrounds the finding of the clothes of a man on the bank of the river at the boathouses. The clothes which include, cap, vest, trousers with braces attached, and socks, were still there in the evening the authorities were informed. Although Chief Ferguson, working on the theory that someone has doffed his clothes and jumped in for a swim and been drowned, has patrolled the river in a boat and along the shore, as yet, no light has been thrown on the mystery. It is possible that Walkerton has another mystery similar to that of last fall when a Wingham man's body was taken from the river at almost the same spot where the clothes were found some days after he was drowned, but the probable solution is that some wag thinking to have some fun and create excitement placed the clothes there for a hoax. It is also possible that some tramp on securing a new suit of clothes, discarded his old ones, leaving them in a heap, a prey to the elements.

Visited Home in England

Under the caption "Canadian Visitors" the Express, published at Holmfirth, England, describes in the following paragraph the visit of Private Bert Cartwright accompanied by Pte. Norman Huck and Alfred Tolton to the former's home in that town.

"During the week Holmfirth has received other soldier visitors from over the seas. One of them is Private Herbert Cartwright, of C Co. 18th bat. 2nd Canadian Contingent, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Jonathan Cartwright, of Victoria Square and South Lane. Private Cartwright comes back home in the Kings uniform after a settlement in Canada of five years, during which time he has been working in Walkerton, Ontario as a boot and shoe operative, a trade in which he was brought up by his father here in Holmfirth. He arrived in Holmfirth on Wednesday morning, accompanied by two friends, Privates A. Tolton, and Private N. Huck of the same regiment and also of Walkerton. They were pals together before the war broke out and enlisting together they are still pals in regimental service.

A representative of the Express had the pleasure of a short chat with them on Wednesday afternoon. The three lads look in perfect health, bronzed in complexion, and they admit that their military training has done them a world of good. They had five months of it in Canada, and for several weeks now they have been in camp in the south of England. It has not been easy to get leave of absence, and perhaps the fact that the three of them wanted to come to Holmfirth together has increased the difficulty, and they anticipate that when they return on Monday, it will not be long before they are booked to cross the Channel. They are eager to go, because as they say, that is what they have come for.

Pte. Cartwright had intended coming home this summer and the war has expedited his coming. Being a Holmfirth lad, the manufacture of cloth is a familiar thing to him, but his comrades have had no experience of the industry, and they are particularly keen on seeing how the khaki is made. Consequently they have been able to spend several enjoyable hours at Holmfirth Mills, and among other visits which have been paid has been one to the Military Cottage Hospital.

The Cartwright family is well represented in the army. In addition to Herbert, the eldest son, Ernest, has also enlisted in the Expeditionary force and he will be coming over in the next contingent. He also has been living in Walkerton, and engaged in the boot and shoe trade. The youngest boy Moorhouse is now in the 2,5th Duke of Wellington's at Thoresby Park.

Successful Dance

The informal patriotic dance which was held in the town hall on Friday last was very successful the attendance being good. The proceeds which will be devoted to Patriotic and Red Cross work amounted to over $75. Among the outsiders who attended the dance were: Misses Edna Deibel and Dorothy Armstrong of Hanover, Miss Cappie Spence Southampton, Miss Pauline Clapp of Mildmay, Miss Marge O'Connor Toronto, and Mr. Marshall of Durham.

Wants Water Filtered.

At the council meeting on Monday evening a letter from Mr. D. Robertson was read, urging that the water which is being used for domestic purposes in town be filtered. Since the water from the new wells has been in use there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction among the water takers as the water has had a distinctly mineral taste. It is for the purpose of doing away with this that Mr. Robertson asks that the water be filtered, but the council have declined to take any action and will probably not do so for some time at least.

Death of Mr. Giesler.

Mr. Jack Giesler a well-known resident of the west ward died in the Bruce County Hospital on Wednesday morning of this week following an operation for gall-stones which was performed on Tuesday afternoon by Dr. H. H. Sinclair. The deceased had been ill for some three weeks and his condition become such that as a last resort in an effort to save his life he was removed to the hospital on Tuesday for an operation, but the shock was too great and he passed away on Wednesday. The late Mr. Giesler who was in his 41st year is survived by his wife and three small children. The funeral will probably take place on Friday morning.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

When he found himself dressed again, after the unrestraint of so many months, in close fitting waistcoat and coat, he gave a sigh. It seemed to him that he ceased to be the free and active Pierre Laurier who had worked so joyfully ten hours a day in the open air, inhaling the invigorating odors of juniper and fir-tree, and that he became once more the Pierre Laurier of the past, who, cursing his art and despairing of the future, spent his hours between the boudoir of a coquette and the gambling saloon of the club.

He raised his eyes. Night was falling, but behind the chestnut groves, bathing in its pallid light the frowning rocks, the moon shone, like a silver crescent in the sky. The forest breeze, warm and fragrant, passed over the young man's brow, soft as the caressing touch of a wing. He looked at the sea, which rolled, profound and calm, at his feet, and murmured "You may bear me away. I fear neither you nor those from whom you separate me." His transitory discontent passed away, and at this moment, when he was about to take the supreme step that was to decide his fate, he found himself master of his thoughts and of his feelings.

No emotion stirred his heart at the thought of the woman he had so passionately loved. He dared to evoke her image. He saw her with her low brow crowned with its raven tresses; her beautiful eyes with their long lashes, her intoxicating glance,—but he remained indifferent and disdainful. He loved her no longer, all was over; the charm had ceased; the philter was powerless. He had recovered possession of himself, and his heart, freed from its bondage, was once more worthy of a good woman's acceptance. And tears of emotion came to Laurier's eyes. His trembling lips murmured a confession of love, and his whole being reached through space toward the adored object.

On the following day at nine o'clock the boat sailed. Pierre again saw the dock beside which the Saint Laurent lay at anchor, while he was painting its figurehead of carved wood, the mole, the bastion of the Dragon, and, in succession, Cape Corso, Giraglia, and the Italian coast. On board the boat, which sailed rapidly, he retraced the route taken by the little smuggling vessel.

As they drew nearer the French coast he asked himself with growing uneasiness what could be the cause of Davidoff's hasty summons. A vague disquietude took possession of him, and he began to fear that some misfortune had happened. To whom? The words of the letter written to him at Torrevecchio by the doctor recurred to him: "The report that you had been drowned ,came very near causing the death of one closely connected with Jacques." These words had changed everything in his life. Was this person Juliette, and was she now in danger? Should he arrive only in time to see her, in whom his only hope now lay, expire? But the letter contained these words also: "You passed close to happiness without knowing it, but there is still time for you to regain it." Was this happiness going to escape him anew? Was it not probable that this young girl, who was so beautiful, was loved, and that another, during his absence, had succeeded in curing the wound her heart had received?

A profound sadness took possession of Pierre, at the thought that this last throw upon which he had staked his happiness should lose. A feeling of mental lassitude overpowered him, and he felt that it would be a mortal blow for him, should this prove to be the case. He was consumed by impatience to learn the truth. On board the vessel, as its keel cleaved the blue waters, he longed for some means of corresponding with Davidoff. He stretched out his hands toward the shore, as if the reassuring news he desired were there awaiting him. He envied the albatross its swift wings as it sailed in its melancholy flight through the blue air. He walked the deck nervously, as if his impatience could lend added speed to the motion of the vessel.

He could not sleep, and he remained on deck, his gaze fixed on the horizon. They passed in succession Genoa, Monaco, Nice, Antibes, and Toulon; sailing along this enchanting coast, bordered down to the water's edge with gardens on whose sands of gold the waves die languorously away. His heart beat quickly as he saw the Chateau d'If looming darkly in the distance, its lights gleaming through the night like eyes looking into immensity. He had but little baggage and on arriving at Marseilles he gave it to a street porter, and crossing the gangway, hastily took a carriage and drove to the railway station. He paused not an instant, his only thought was to reach his destination as soon as possible. The express was to leave at half-past eleven, and he had still an hour at his disposal. He went to the telegraph office and sent the following despatch to Davidoff: "Arrived in Marseilles; will be in Paris to-morrow evening at six."

When he saw the message pass from the hands of the clerk to those of the operator he felt a sense of relief, as if some part of himself had already gone on in advance. He went to the restaurant, where he breakfasted, though without an appetite, to kill time. The gates being at last opened and the train ready to start, he installed himself in a compartment and gave himself up with a new sense of delight to the pleasure of being rapidly borne through space. Buried in a corner of the carriage, his eyes closed although he was not asleep, he remained motionless, counting as they passed them the stations which still separated him from the end of his journey, as a prisoner counts on the calendar the days which still separate him from liberty.

Toward dawn, however, he grew exhausted and fell into a doze. For two days and nights he had not slept. When he awoke he saw with delight that he had gained upon time during his sleep, for it was broad daylight, and the train was approaching Macon. Before him, bathed in sunshine, stretched on either hand the rich and smiling fields of Burgundy. Pierre felt as if he had almost reached his journey's end. He found himself again in the midst of scenery which, for a year, he had not seen. No longer reddish rocks and foaming torrents; no longer shepherds armed with guns watching from some eminence with a proud and serious air their scanty flock or their unruly goats at pasture. Instead he saw peasants, at once stout and active, guiding the plow, drawn by large white oxen, yoked in pairs, along the brown furrows; fields covered with crops, vines bending under their load of grapes, forests of a vivid green traversed by grassy paths leading into cool, green glades. It was the severe beauty of the central provinces of France, not the soft and radiant beauty of Provence or the wild grandeur of Corsica.

Space fled before him; the train passed swiftly by hillsides, valleys, and rivers, and Pierre gave himself up more and more to his own thoughts. He fell into an uneasy reverie, in which he asked himself with a vain persistence what it was that had caused Davidoff to recall him so suddenly, and a feverish agitation seized him as they approached Paris. He consulted his watch more than twenty times between the great city and Melun. Passing the fortifications he stood up preparing already to leave the train. At last the engine, whistling shrilly, slowed up, the turnplates sounded, and the train stopped at the station.

Pierre, standing on the platform ready to leave the train, leaped to the ground and was caught in the embrace of two strong arms. He raised his eyes, recognized Davidoff, uttered a cry of joy, and, pressing in his turn the hand of his faithful friend, drew him aside.

"Well?" he cried, putting all his eagerness into this one question.

"Calm yourself," said the Russian, who understood Laurier's anxiety. "Juliette is in no present danger."

Pierre breathed a profound sigh as if his heart had been relieved from a heavy weight.

"And Jacques?" he asked.

"Ah! Jacques!" responded Davidoff, "it is he, more than any one else, who gives me cause for uneasiness. But let us not remain here. We are attracting notice."

He put his arm through the painter's and drew him away through the crowd now hurrying out of the station.

"What luggage have you?" he asked.

"This valise and a box which is in the wagon."

"Come, we will have the trunk taken to the hotel. For you must accompany me, I shall not leave you. Instead of waiting for you as I had said I would in my despatch, I preferred coming to meet you. I feared some indiscretion on your part. Do you know that if Mlle. de Vignes were to see you appear suddenly before her the shock might prove fatal to her in her present condition?"

They drove along the boulevard conversing together, and Laurier was too confused to take in fully all there was to see and hear. The bustle of Paris, after leaving the train in which for twenty hours he had been shaken, succeeding the profound calm and retirement of his life at Torrevecchio, fevered his brain, dazzled his eyes, and deafened his ears. He was obliged to make an effort in order to listen to and understand Davidoff. He felt weary in body and over-excited in mind.

"My journey has tired me greatly," he said, "and yet I feel that I cannot rest—"

"You have been living for the past three days on your nerves," returned the doctor. "I am going to set you right again. Trust to me. If I never had patients more difficult to cure than you—"

The carriage rolled into the courtyard of the Grand Hotel. They alighted, and followed by a boy carrying Laurier's valise ascended to Davidoff's apartment. Laurier's chamber was separated from the Russian's by a parlor. Left alone they examined each other silently for an instant; then the doctor, pointing out a seat to his friend, said:

"Sit down; we will dine here and talk at the same time, and if you are reasonable I may do something for you this very evening."

Pierre's eyes lighted up. "What?" he asked. "Will you permit me to see her?"

Davidoff laughed.

"You are at least frank," he said. "To see her! It seems, then, she is the only subject you and I have to talk about! Well, you are right, and it was of her I was going to speak. Since the beginning of the week I have been here, and I have gradually accustomed her to the thought of your reappearance. In the depths of her heart she has mourned you as dead for many months past. From the first words spoken by me, casting the shadow of a doubt on your death, she has revived, but in a manner to terrify her mother and myself. A violent fever has taken possession of her. Her weakness was so great! She has been fading slowly ever since your disappearance, growing paler and paler every day, like a flower cankered at the heart. As to her brother—but it is better to speak only of her."

"Is the news you have to give me of Jacques, then, so painful?"

"Heart-breaking, morally and physically. This week, spurred on by an imperious need for money, he put for sale the property belonging jointly to his mother, his sister and himself. The remonstrances of the notary and the entreaties of Mme. de Vignes were alike useless. He desires to realize the money, no matter at what cost, without troubling himself about the loss that must result from this hasty sale. He is insane, and his insanity has taken a dangerous form."

"And who or what has been the cause of this insanity?" asked Pierre.

"Love. A woman has been the ruin of this unhappy man, whose moral nature was never strong."

"And is this woman so fascinating that he cannot be turned away from her; has she so powerful an influence over him that he cannot be torn from her?"

"She is the most fascinating, the most dangerous of women. If I were to name her to you—"

At these words Pierre turned pale; he looked eagerly at Davidoff, the name upon his lips which he divined the doctor was about to pronounce, when the latter, smiling bitterly and looking at the painter as if he would pierce the inmost recesses of his soul, said:

"Ah, you have understood me. Yes, it is into the hands of Clemence that Jacques has fallen. She loved him ardently, he loved her in return—well, as men love her. At the end of six months she has grown cold as marble, and he is more passionately in love than ever. But why should I seek to describe the condition of his mind to you? To understand it you have only to recall your own feelings."

Laurier remained silent and motionless, his head sunk upon his breast, and the Russian resumed with force:

"He adores her, do you understand, Pierre? He lives only for her."

The painter raised his head and exclaimed in compassionate accents.

"Unhappy man! For such a woman, to have given up everything, to have forgotten every duty! But he is to be pitied rather than blamed, she has such dangerous power."

At these words Davidoff's countenance cleared up; his eyes sparkled with joy; he went to his friend, and with affected irony, said:

"So, then, there is no feeling in your heart for Jacques but one of pity."

"And what other feeling should I have for him?" answered Pierre. "Ought I to blame him after showing myself weaker and more culpable than he? No, I can only pity him!"

Davidoff took Pierre's hand in his and shook it vigorously.

"And you feel no thrill of emotion at the recollection of the old love, no return of your former tenderness, no feeling of anger against your friend?" he said.

"So this is what you feared?" said Laurier, a flush mounting to his pale face. "You doubted that I was completely cured of my insensate passion, and you wished to put me to the proof? Oh, do not be afraid; speak plainly. You doubted me!"

"Yes," returned Davidoff, with firmness. "I desired to know whether unconsciously—"

"Ah!" cried Pierre, "question me then, look into the secret recesses of my heart. You will find there no other feeling than one of bitter regret for my folly and the ardent desire to atone for it. If I had not judged myself worthy of a pure affection and capable of responding to it by a constant love, you would never have seen me again. Fear nothing on my account, Davidoff. The Pierre Laurier you know is dead—killed on a tempestuous night, and the man you see before you, though he has the same features, fortunately has not the same heart!"

"That's right," cried Davidoff, gayly. "Ah, a heavy weight has been removed from my conscience. If I had not been able to count upon you with certainty I do not know how I could have carried through my undertaking. It is surrounded on all sides by difficulties and anxieties. It will be necessary for you to meet Clemence—"

"If it is absolutely necessary," returned Pierre, "I will make the effort, but I shall do it with great reluctance."

"No doubt it will be with greater reluctance than in former days," answered the Russian with a smile. "But we must try and save Jacques from her clutches, and nothing less than your intervention will enable us to succeed. Let us leave that for the future, however, and occupy ourselves with the present. Let us speak of Mlle. de Vignes."

Pierre's brow cleared. At this moment dinner was served, and the two friends seated themselves at table and spent the next hour in exchanging confidence.

Pierre gave an account of his sojourn at Torrevecchio to the doctor, and the latter recounted to the painter all that had taken place during his absence. In this way they were able to arrive at the conviction, Davidoff that Laurier was, as he affirmed, radically cured of his fatal passion, and Laurier that Davidoff, in recalling him so hastily as he had done, had acted with as much wisdom as decision. Toward nine o'clock they left the hotel and set out for the house of Mme. de Vignes. In the boulevard, in the mild air of the summer night, Pierre felt his heart swell with joy and hope. He raised his eyes to heaven with a feeling of repentance at having so insanely despaired of happiness.

During the past few days Mme. de Vignes, forewarned by Davidoff, had seen the future, which had appeared to her so dark, lighted up by a faint ray of hope. The certainty that Pierre Laurier lived, the positiveness with which Davidoff affirmed that the painter loved Juliette, and loved only her, had given the mother some little consolation. In the midst of the misfortunes which overwhelmed her, with everything to fear from her son, and everything to fear for her daughter, the possibility of seeing Juliette once more restored to health and tranquility was a source of sweet satisfaction to her. What were pecuniary cares compared to the anxieties caused by her daughter's increasing weakness and dejection? Davidoff had been welcomed as a savior. Communicating his news to Juliette with wise precaution, he had planted at first a seed of hope in her mind which had found fertile soil. By degrees the seed cast roots which spread vigorously; and now the flower, ready to bloom, awaited only a last ray of sunshine. Since the beginning of the week Juliette, without proof, without any further plausible reason than the ardent desire to see the miracle she hoped for wrought, had become convinced that Pierre was living.

The "on dit" of Davidoff had been seized on with avidity by this young heart. Why should not Pierre have been rescued from the waves, as was said, and taken on board a passing trading vessel bound for Corsica, where he had been seen by persons who declared they had recognized him? What was there strange in his remaining all these months hidden from his friends, ashamed perhaps of not having carried into effect the suicidal purpose which he had announced? And was it not natural that he should leave the de Vignes in ignorance of his being alive? All this was admissible. And the young girl was so eager to believe it that she would have thought still stranger things likely.

(To be continued.)

What Hurt Most.

"Why are you crying so bitterly, my little man" asked the kind-hearted old lady as she patted the tearful youngster on his head.

"Bill Jones hit me on the nose,' was the boy's reply.

"Did be hurt much?"

"Now; he didn't hurt me at all, but he ran away before I could hit him back."—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

DIGESTIBLE PIE CRUST.

Just How to Make This Most Desirable Sort Pastry.

Many there are who forego the delights of pie, because the crust is not digestible. Try this recipe.

For one covered pie take one pint of flour one large teaspoonful of salt; sift these twice into a bowl; chop into half a pint of butter and lard, mixed; now, using the knife, moisten with one gill of cold water this is usually ample); do not handle unnecessarily; turn it out on a board, roll lightly away from you about one inch thick; spread a very tin layer of butter over it; cut it in four square parts, place one on the other; roll out thin, away from you, as before.

Grease a deep pie dish, fit the crust in and cut edges neatly. Then put in the filling, dampen edge, place a crust over it, previously nicked several times in the centre; bake in a brisk oven until a golden brown; dust with powdered sugar.

This recipe is good where any pastry is needed. A richer crust is obtained by beating one egg, then adding sufficient cold water to it to make one gill.

Tenniel's Mustache.

The later portraits of Sir John Tenniel, the famous cartoonist of London Punch, show him wearing a full beard and moustache, but his most familiar appearance was with a moustache only, a long, curly one, worthy of one of Ouida's guardsmen. The story of how he came to grow it is interesting.

After the Crimean war the return of the soldiers with full beards started a fashion against which three Punch artists protested. One day, being out on horseback together, they solemnly halted at crossroads and swore on their uplifted hunting crops never to wear hair on lip or chin. Tenniel was one of the party, Leech another and R. T. Pritchett the third.

Leech alone remained true to the vow. Pritchett went to Skye, and on his return with a moustache called on Tenniel. He thrust his head in at the cartoonist's door and dumbly waited. "You scoundrel!" was Tenniel's exclamation. "Then I, too, must!" And he did.

Well Tempered Living.

The statistics of insanity show that the minds of men and women are often made aberrant through the steady drive of environment, in which the simple life and the spurring city life are equally at fault. The figures show the per capita of insanity differs little in city and country. Rural solitude and the abnormal life of the city are alike responsible for mental disease. It is as bad for a man to be too much alone as it is for him to be surrounded by perfervid life. The history of the race, the inquiries of investigators and the judgment of specialists in the diseases of body and mind tell us that the well tempered life, void of excesses, is the plane upon which man and women best endure in mental and bodily health, a temperature of thought and a temperature of action in an environment in which the individual is neither submerged by human society nor detached from it.—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

HER IDEALS CHANGED.

She Saw a Very Large Light After She Was Happily Married.

There was a girl who was quite sure that when it came her turn to marry she could not live in a house any smaller than her father's. "Love in a cottage" was not her idea. Cupid, she thought, needed plenty of room to flap his wings and to practice his archery; he could not pine in a birdcage. So she must have an immense library with a fireplace that would take a six foot long; there must be a drawing room with parquetry flooring and thick rugs sliding about on it; the dining room must be able to hold a large table with an imposing bowl of flowers. She visualized herself ruling a salon, hostess to a brilliant coterie of people who would help her social ambition and her husband's business.

A school friend of hers came to see her a year and a half after she had married and found her in a little frame house on a side street, ridiculously happy with her husband and her baby. The back yard was just about big enough to hold a whirling clothes frame and a narrow flower bed against the fence; the piazza was as snug as a sailor's hammock; the largest room was about the size of the vestibule of the bride's girlhood home.

"I know what you're thinking," laughed the proud little housekeeper to her guest. "You're wondering how I could make up my mind to live in this tiny piano box. But I've made a discovery. I've found that it isn't the size of the house that matters; it's the size of the heart, and the biggest hearts can live in the littlest houses."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Plans of Submarines.

The Matin says: "The German submarines now being used against British merchantships are made after plans by the celebrated American designer, Simon Lake, of Bridgeport, which were stolen from him by Krupps. The plans were submitted to Krupps, whose directors gave their word of honor to divulge nothing. Eventually they entered into engagements, on behalf of the Emperor, whereby the designer was to receive £800,000. As he could get neither his money nor his plans back he expostulated, and was told that the patenting of anything concerning war was illegal in Germany, and that he therefore had no claim. Mr. Lake has since seen several German submarines, and is convinced that they are built from the plans he confided to Krupps."

A Tragedy of the Trenches.

The Irish Guards were holding a position at Ypres, and flying bullets were the order of the day. The Germans endeavored to break through, and after a particularly brisk volley Private Flynn was heard to shout:

"Murder or wars, I'm done now altogether!"

"Why, have you been hit?" shouted his Captain.

"Not entirely hit, sir," shouts Flynn; "but I've been waiting this ten minutes for a smoke from Murtagh's pipe and by the powers they've just shot it out av his mouth."

CARDINAL GIBBONS ON WOMAN.

(New York Sun)

The letter on women suffrage by Cardinal Gibbons, and the accompanying statement by which he enlarges and enforces it, represent the conservative, some might say "the mediaeval" view, the old and long religious view. Let us hear this illustrious churchman, uttering ancient opinions, which may or may not be approved by the moderns, but which must have a wide echo in this country and the rest of the world:

"Woman is queen indeed, but her empire is the domestic kingdom. The greatest political triumphs she would achieve in public life fade into insignificance compared with the serene glory which radiates from the domestic shrine and which she illumines and warms by her conjugal and motherly virtues. If she is ambitious of the dual empire of public and private life, then, like the fabled dog beholding his image in the water, she will lose both, she will fall from the lofty pedestal where nature and Christianity have placed her and will fail to grasp the sceptre of political authority from the strong hand of her male competitor.

"Though woman is debarred from voting she brings into the world and rocks the cradle of the nation's future citizens. She rears and moulds the character of those who are to be the future rulers and statesmen the heroes and benefactors of the country. Surely this is glory enough for her."

This assumes the whole case, does it not? The other side assumes it too. In all the States where this matter is to be voted on the words of James Cardinal Gibbons will be heard with respect. And yet perhaps they are not highly illuminative, any more than the other side would be.

BABY'S GREAT DANGER DURING HOT WEATHER

More little ones die during the hot weather than at any other time of the year. Diarrhoea, dysentery, cholera infantum and stomach troubles come without warning, and when a medicine is not at hand to give promptly the short delay too frequently means that the child has passed beyond aid. Baby's Own Tablets should always be kept in homes where there are young children. An occasional dose of the Tablets will prevent stomach and bowel troubles, or if the trouble comes suddenly the prompt use of the Tablets will cure the baby. The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

The Legion of Honor.

In 1802 Bonaparte passed the formation of a legion of honor which was to include in its ranks men of distinction from every walk of life, not only soldiers, but savants, jurists and authors.

"It is aristocratic in its tendency," said Berlier, a distinguished lawyer, "leading France back to the ancient regime when crosses, badges and ribbons were the toys of monarchy."

"Well," replied Napoleon, "men are led by toys. The French are not all changed by ten years of revolution; they are what the Gauls were—fierce and fickle. They have one feeling—honor. We must nourish that feeling; they must have distinction."

The oath taken by a new member of the Legion of Honor was to devote himself "to the service of the republic, to the maintenance of the integrity of its territory, the defence of its government, laws and the property which they have consecrated; to fight against every attempt to re-establish the feudal regime or to reproduce the titles and qualities thereto belonging."—"Napoleon and the End of the French Revolution," by Charles F. Warwick.

BRAVERY IN BATTLE.

After the Fighting Has Begun the Officers Give Few Orders.

An officer in our regular army who saw fighting in the Spanish war pointed out the other day that most persons had a very wrong conception of how soldiers fight in modern battles.

"After a regiment has wheeled into position to attack the foe and the actual fighting has begun," he said, "the officers really have little to do with the proceedings. There is so much noise, for one thing, that commands cannot be heard, and for this reason whistles, in many armies, have been substituted for bugles, because their shrill blast carries better than the heavier notes of the brass. Beyond giving the signal for the charge the officers can do little. The men, once they see the line of the enemy in front of them, know what is expected of them and carry out their work with surprisingly few orders.

"Skirmish drills in times of peace have taught the troops how to act together, and it is amazing to see how quickly the men adapt themselves to the conditions of actual battle. It is the corporals and sergeants who are in the line with the men who are the real steadying influence in a fight. They know the characteristics of the individual private in a way that the commissioned officers can never know them and are prepared to give a calming word to this or that one when the emergency arises.

"In my own experience I have known a private who had served three enlistments to take charge of a company in a charge, and the officers and non-coms. were very glad to leave it to him. After the scrap was over he became a private once more, but while that row was on, so far as actual influence with the men was concerned, he was of a great deal more importance than his captain. The way that man could wriggle into cover was a revelation, and he went through three campaigns without a scratch. His example in the regiment was a big asset.

"Bravery in battle, according to my experience, is very much a matter of temperament. Some men are carried along by a sort of ecstasy, others hold themselves to the work by sheer force of will, while others—and these are the best—go through a fight with a sort of grim interest as if it was a highly amusing though somewhat dangerous sport they were engaged in, like polo or football."—New York Times.

AFTER ELEVEN MONTHS.

It has taken Great Britain eleven months to waken up to the fact that she is in life and death grips with a powerful, unscrupulous and cruel enemy which will overwhelm her if she does not put forth her full strength to defeat that enemy. What a pity Great Britain did not, at the opening of the war, sense its full import. There would have been a different story to tell to-day. It would not now be necessary for Lloyd-George to move heaven and earth for more munitions, nor for General French to plead for them. After eleven months of war the Germans are still in Belgium and France, and they are now beginning to overrun Russian territory. To be sure, we do not belittle the work of the allies or their achievements. We know that Germany has failed in her main object, and we believe that she is condemned to failure in the struggle. But had Britain at the outset put forth the efforts she is making to-day, Germany would not now be in either France or Flanders.

But there is no use crying over spilt milk. The retreat of the Russians may be somewhat discouraging, and the slow progress at the Dardanelles is not anything to cheer over. But notwithstanding, the allies have every reason to believe that the Russians will again "come back," and that the Dardanelles will in due time be forced. Since the war began, Italy has thrown in her lot with the allies, and is now occupying quite a slice of Austrian territory. Munitions are war are being rapidly manufactured for the British army, and Lord Kitchener should have in the near future all the men and guns and shells that he can possibly need for his promised drive.

The enemy has neither the men, money nor material resources that the allies possess. They are merely staving off the evil day, sacrificing thousands of lives and wasting their heritage without hope of achieving the purpose they set out to achieve. The German people may be united now in the fight for the Fatherland, but a day of reckoning is coming for the Kaiser, let the war end when it may.

◆

EMBARGO ON ARMS.

The Germans ask America to do what they have never done themselves—refuse to sell munitions of war to other nations. Germany is mad because the United States sell shells and guns and explosives to the allies, but she is buying all she can get from the other neutrals and it is believed is getting munitions from the States as well which are being smuggled through the British blockade. The Germans ask that the States should stop "giving the allies bullets to kill German soldiers," in order that the Germans may be allowed to use all their bullets to kill allied soldiers. They declare that the giving of American munitions tends to prolong the war. But if the allies are to win, and we believe they are, this will tend to shorten the war. The Chicago Evening Post hits this off prettty slick when it says:

> Americans are pointing out, too, that most of the Americans killed in the Spanish war came to death through rifles and bullets marked "Made in Germany." They are pointing out that nothing at all is being said by Germany or German-Americans about an embargo on the shipment of war munitions into Germany, Austria and Turkey from the various neutral nations of Europe. They mention the fact that the German-Americans say nothing about an embargo on the immense shipments of copper and other munition material which have been smuggled through the English blockade into Germany; nor have they spoken of the German decree which forced Belgian workmen in conquered Belgian territory to work on the manufacture of war material "to shoot down" their Belgian fellow countrymen.

The Post points out that Germany takes care not to make an "official" protest against the sale of U. S. arms to the allies. Why? it asks. And it answers its question by saying that "if Germany offered official protest against the shipment of arms, such a protest would create a precedent. It would establish Germany as a champion of the doctrine that neutral nations should not ship arms to belligerents. It would, therefore, debar Germany from doing this in the future. Germany does not want to be so debarred. She wants to be free to send arms to any nation that is fighting any other nation." In other words, German-Americans are asking America to do something that Germany offers no assurance she herself will ever do. They are asking America to "hold the bag" on a moral claim to which Germany herself does not subscribe.

Premier Asquith's thrift campaign is modelled after that of the French. The appropriation bill of 5,600,000,000 francs, which passed the Chamber of Deputies by a vote of 492 to 1, was the occasion for the French minister of finance to impress the French people with the necessity of spending it at home. Like Asquith, he advised the French to buy made-in-France goods, so as to keep the money at home, where it can be turned over and over.

About a dozen of British subjects have been arrested at New York because they had arranged at San Francisco to go to Britain to enter the army. It seems that it is a criminal offense to recruit military forces in the United States for service against nations with which that nation is at peace. There is no analogy between such recruitment and the voluntary departure from the country of alien reservists as passengers in mercantile vessels. It is true, the reservists usually are given notice of their liability to military service by the consuls of their nationality, but a distinction is made between such urgency and the urgency of recruiting agents upon men who are under no obligation to serve or to enlist.

The Milwaukee, Wis., Sunday Kuryer Polski says to Count Bernstorff re the sinking of the Lusitania:

> But there were about 50 babies and perhaps 150 other little children on the steamer. They didn't read your warning of your or your Kaiser's intention to murder them if they go on the steamer. And if they heard of your warning, they did not understand it. And so these two hundred innocent children were cruelly drowned like so many little rats by your Kaiser with your knowledge. They were drowned perhaps because they did not understand. Perhaps if they would have understood your and your barbarous boss' murderous intention, they would not have risked their little lives. Some one else put them on the steamer—and your Kaiser murdered them for it! Murdered two hundred innocent children just to show his "power" and "authority!"

The Buffalo Express is responsible for the following: "Perhaps this war has furnished no more extraordinary incident than the sending of food by France into Luxemburg. The Grand Duchy, by failing forcibly to resist the Germans, forfeited its neutral rights. In international law, it is for war purposes a part of Germany. The Germans promised to interfere with the country as little as possible and to pay for everything taken. That promise, if fulfilled, should mean prosperity. Yet, as a matter of fact, the people of Luxemburg are reduced to starvation. Germany refuses to feed them, and generous France, despite her own sufferings, is sending them grain by way of Switzerland." Germany declared that it would respect Belgian territory after the war. Now she declares that she will annex it. What promise has Germany kept?

Suffered From Salt Rheum

FOR MANY YEARS.

Salt Rheum or Eczema is one of the most painful of all skin diseases, and if not attended to immediately may become very deep seated.

Give the blood a good cleansing by the use of that grand old medicine Burdock Blood Bitters. This sterling remedy has been on the market for the past forty years, and is the best blood cleanser on the market to-day.

Mrs. William H. Fowlie, Cole's Island, N.B., writes: "I have been a sufferer from salt rheum for a good many years, and was so bad I could not do my own work. I tried a good many medicines, but they all failed to do me any good until I tried Burdock Blood Bitters. I had not taken one bottle until I found a great change, and I am most thankful for trying it. I hope that every other sufferer from salt rheum will try B.B.B."

THE Changeling

A shade of disappointment passed over Mr. Carrollton's face as he replied, "Tell her I am sorry she thinks more of Hagar than of me."

The next moment he was gone, and leaning against the chimney, Mag watched with tearful eyes the carriage as it wound up the grassy road. On the brow of the hill, just before it would disappear from sight, it suddenly stopped. Something was the matter with the harness, and while John was busy adjusting it Mr. Carrollton leaned from the window, and looking back, started involuntarily as he caught sight of the figure so clearly defined upon the house-top. A slight suspicion of the truth came upon him and kissing his hand, he waved it gracefully toward her. Mag's handkerchief was wet with tears, but she shook it out in the morning breeze, and sent to Arthur Carrollton, as she thought, her last goodby.

Fearing lest her grandmother should see her swollen eyes, she stole down the stairs, and taking her shawl and bonnet from the table in the hall, ran off into the woods, going to a pleasant, mossy bank, not far from Hagar's cottage, where she had more than once sat with Arthur Carrollton, and where she fancied she would never sit with him again.

"I don't believe it's for him that I am crying," she thought, as she tried in vain to stay her tears; "I always intended to hate him, and I 'most know I do; I'm only feeling badly, because I won't run away, and Henry and Rose will go without me so soon!" And fully satisfied at having discovered the real cause of her grief, she laid her head upon the bright autumnal grass and wept bitterly, holding her breath, and listening intently as she heard, in the distance, the sound of the engine which was bearing Mr. Carrollton away.

It did not occur to her that he could not yet have reached the depot, and as she knew nothing of a change in the time of the trains, she was taken wholly by surprise when, fifteen minutes later, a manly form bent over her, as she lay upon the bank, and a voice, earnest and thrilling in tones, murmured softly. "Maggie, are those tears for me?"

When about half-way to the station Mr. Carrollton had heard of the change of the time, and knowing he should not be in season, had turned back, with the intention of waiting for the next train, which would pass in a few hours. Learning that Maggie was in the woods, he had started in quest of her, going naturally to the mossy bank, where, as we have seen, he found her weeping on the grass. She was weeping for him—he was sure of that. He was not indifferent to her, as he had sometimes feared, and for an instant he felt tempted to take her in his arms and tell how dear she was to him.

"I will speak to her first," he thought, and so he asked "if the tears were for him?"

Inexpressibly astonished and mortified at having him see her thus, Maggie started to her feet, while angry words at being thus intruded upon trembled on her lips. But, winding his arm around her, Mr. Carrollton drew her to his side, explaining to her in a few words how he came to be there, and continuing: "I do not regret the delay, if by its means I have discovered what I very much wish to know, Maggie, do you care for me? Were you weeping because I had left you?"

He drew her very closely to him—looking anxiously into her face, which she covered with her hands. She knew he was in earnest, and the knowledge that he loved her thrilled her for an instant with indescribable happiness. A moment, however, and thoughts of her engagement with another flashed upon her. "She must not sit there thus with Arthur Carrollton—she would be true to Henry," and with mingled feelings of sorrow, regret and anger—though why she should experience either she did not then understand—she drew herself from him, and when he said again, "Will Maggie answer? Are those tears for me?" she replied, petulantly: "No; can't a body cry without being bothered for a reason? I came down here to be alone?"

"I did not mean to intrude, and I beg your pardon for having done so," said Mr. Carrollton, sadly, adding, as Maggie made no reply: "I expected a different answer, Maggie. I almost hoped you liked me, and I believe now that you do."

In Maggie's bosom there was a fierce struggle of feeling. She did like Arthur Carrollton — and she thought she liked Henry Warner—at all events she was engaged to him, and half angry at the former for having disturbed her, and still more angry at herself for being thus disturbed, she exclaimed, as he again placed his arm around her. "Leave me alone, Mr. Carrollton. I don't like you. I don't like anybody!" and gathering up her shawl, which lay on the grass, she ran away to Hagar's cabin, hoping he would follow her. But he did not. It was his first attempt at love making, and very much disheartened he walked slowly back to the house; and while Maggie, from Hagar's door, was looking to see if he were coming, he, from the parlor window, was watching, too, for her, with a shadow on his brow, and a load upon his heart. Madam Conway knew that something was wrong, but it was in vain that she sought for an explanation. Mr. Carrollton kept his own secret, and, consoling herself with his volunteered assurance that in case it became necessary for him to return to England he should, before embarking, visit Hillsdale, she bade him a second adieu.

In the meantime, Maggie, having giving up all hopes of again seeing Mr. Carrollton, was waiting impatiently the coming of Hagar, who was absent, having, as Maggie readily conjectured, gone to Richland. It was long past noon when she returned, and by that time the stains had disappeared from Maggie's face, which looked nearly as bright as ever. Still, it was with far less eagerness than usual that she took from Hagar's hand the expected letter from Henry. It was a long, affectionate epistle, urging her once more to accompany him, and saying if she still refused she must let him know immediately, as they were intending to start for New York in a few days.

"I can't go," said Maggie; "it would not be right." And going to the time-worn desk, where, since her secret correspondence, she had kept materials for writing, she wrote to Henry a letter, telling him she felt badly to disappoint him, but she deemed it much wiser to defer their marriage until her grandmother felt differently, or at least until she was at an age to act for herself. This being done, she went slowly back to the house, which to her seemed desolate indeed. Her grandmother saw readily that something was the matter, and rightly guessing the cause, she forebore questioning her, neither did she once that day mention Mr. Carrollton, although Anna Jeffrey did, telling her what he had said about her "thinking more about Hagar than of himself," and giving as his opinion that he was much displeased at her rudeness in running away.

"Nobody cares for his displeasure," answered Maggie, greatly vexed at Anna, who took especial delight in annoying her.

Thus a week went by, when one evening, as Madam Conway and Maggie sat together in the parlor, they were surprised by the sudden appearance of Henry Warner. He had accompanied his aunt and sister to New York, where they were to remain for a few days, and then, impelled by a strong desire to see Margaret once more, he had come with the vain hope that at the last hour she would consent to fly with him, or her grandmother consent to give her up. All the afternoon he had been at Hagar's cottage waiting for Maggie, and at length, determining to see her, he had ventured to the house. With a scowling frown, Madam Conway looked at him through her glasses, while Maggie, half joyfully, half fearfully, went forward to meet him. In a few words he explained why he was there, and then again asked of Madam Conway if Margaret could go.

"I do not believe she cares to go," thought Madam Conway, as she glanced at Maggie's face; but she did not say so, lest she should awaken within the young girl a feeling of opposition. She had watched Maggie closely, and felt sure that her affection for Henry Warner was neither deep nor lasting. Arthur Carrollton's presence had done much toward weakening it, and a few months more would suffice to wear it away entirely. Still, from what had passed, she fancied that opposition alone would only make the matter worse by rousing Maggie at once. She knew far more of human nature than either of the young people before her; and after a little reflection she suggested that Henry should leave Maggie with her for a year, during which time no communication whatever should pass between them, while she would promise faithfully not to influence Margaret either way.

"If at the end of the year," said she, "you both retain for each other the feelings you have now, I will no longer object to the marriage, but will make the best of it."

At first Henry spurned the proposition, and when he saw that Margaret thought well of it, he reproached her with a want of feeling, saying "she did not love him as she had once done."

"I shall not forget you, Henry," said Maggie, coming to his side and taking his hand in hers, "neither will you forget me; and when the year has passed away, only think how much pleasanter it will be for us to be married here at home, with grandma's blessing on our union!"

"If I only knew you would prove true!" said Henry, who missed something in Maggie's manner.

"I do mean to prove true," she answered sadly, though at that moment another face, another form, stood between her and Henry Warner, who, knowing that Madam Conway would not suffer her to go with him on any terms, concluded at last to make virtue of necessity, and accordingly expressed his willingness to wait, provided Margaret were allowed to write occasionally either to himself or Rose.

But to this Madam Conway could not consent. "She wished the test to be perfect," she said, "and unless he accepted her terms, he must give Maggie up at once and forever."

As there seemed no alternative, Henry rather ungraciously yielded the point, promising to leave Maggie free for a year, while she, too, promised not to write either to him or to Rose, except with her grandmother's consent. Maggie Miller's word once passed, Madam Conway knew that it would not be broken, and she unhesitatingly left the young people together while they said their parting words. A message of love from Maggie to Rose—a hundred protestations of eternal fidelity, and then they parted; Henry, sad and disappointed, slowly wending his way back to the spot where Hagar impatiently awaited his coming, while Maggie, leaning from her chamber window, and listening to the sound of his retreating footsteps, brushed away a tear, wondering the while why it was she felt so relieved.

CHAPTER XVI.

Half in sorrow, half in joy, old Hagar listened to the story which Henry told her, standing at her cottage door. In sorrow, because she had learned to like the young man, learned to think of him as Maggie's husband who would not wholly cast her off, if her secret should chance to be divulged; and in joy, because her idol would be with her yet a little longer.

"Maggie will be faithful quite as long as you," she said, when he expressed his fears of her forgetfulness; and trying to console himself with this assurance, he sprang into the carriage in which he had come, and was driven rapidly away.

He was too late for the night express, but, taking the early morning train, he reached New York just as the sun was setting.

"Alone! my brother, alone?" queried Rose, as he entered the private parlor of the hotel where she was staying with her aunt.

"Yes, alone, just as I expected," he answered, somewhat bitterly.

Then very briefly he related to her the particulars of his adventure, to which she listened eagerly, one moment, chiding herself for the feint, shadowy hope which whispered that possibly Maggie Miller would never be his wife, and again sympathizing in his disappointment.

"A year would not be very long," she said, "and in the new scenes to which he was going a part of it would pass rapidly away; and then, in her childlike, guileless manner, she drew a glowing picture of the future, when, her own health restored, they would return to their old home in Leominster, where, after a few months more, he would bring to them his bride.

"You are my comforting angel, Rose," he said, folding her lovingly in his arms, and kissing her smooth, white cheek. "With such a treasure as you for a sister, I ought not to repine, even though Maggie Miller should never be mine."

The words were lightly spoken, and by him soon forgotten, but Rose remembered them long, dwelling upon them in the wearisome nights when, in her narrow berth, she listened to the swelling sea, as it dashed against the vessel's side. Many a fond remembrance, too, she gave to Maggie Miller, who, in her woodland home, thought often of the travelers on the sea, never wishing that she was with them, but experiencing always a feeling of pleasure in knowing that she was Maggie Miller yet, and should be until next year's autumn leaves were falling.

Of Arthur Carrollton she thought frequently, wishing she had not been so rude that morning in the woods, and feeling vexed because in his letters to her grandmother, he merely said "Remember me to Margaret."

"I wish he would write something besides that," she thought, "for I remember him now altogether too much for my own good"; and then she wondered "what he would have said that morning if she had not been so cross."

Very little was said to her of him by Madam Conway, who, having learned that he was not going to England, and would ere long return to them, concluded for a time to let the matter rest, particularly as she knew how much Maggie was already interested in one whom she had resolved to hate. Feeling thus confident that all would yet end well, Madam Conway was in unusually good spirits, save when thoughts of Mrs. Douglas, sen., obtruded themselves upon her. Then, indeed, in a most unenviable state of mind, she repined at the disgrace which Theo had brought upon them, and charged Maggie repeatedly to keep it a secret from Mrs. Jeffrey and Anna, the first of whom made many inquiries concerning the family, which she supposed, of course, was very aristocratic.

One day toward the last of November there came to Madam Conway a letter from Mrs. Douglas, sen., wonderful alike in composition and appearance. Directed wrong side up, sealed with a wafer, and stamped with a thimble, it bore an unmistakable resemblance to its writer, who expressed many regrets that "she had not known in the time on't who her illustrious visitors were."

"If I had known," she write, "I should have sot the table in the parlor certing, for though I'm plain and homespun, I known as well as the next one what good manners is, and do my endeavors to practise it. But do tell a body," she continued, "Where you wus, muster day in Wooster. I knocked and pounded enough to raise the dead, and nobody answered. I never noticed you was deaf when you was here, though Betsey Jane thinks the did. If you be, I'll send you up a recipe for a kind of intment which Miss Sam Babbit invented, and which cures everything.

"Theodoshy has been to see us, and though, in my way of thinkin', she ain't as handsome as Margaret, she looks as well as the ginerality of women. I liked her, too, and as soon as the men's winter clothes is off my hands, I calkerlate to have a quiltin', and finish up another bedquilt to send her, for, man-like, George has furnished up his rooms with all sorts of nicknacks, and got only two blankets and two Marsales spreads for his bed. So I've sent 'em down the herrin'-bone and risin' sun quilts for every-day wear, as I don't believe in usin' your best things all the time. My old man says I'd better let 'em alone; but he's got some queer ideas, thinks you'll sniff your nose at my letter, and all that, but I've got more charity for folks, and well I might have, bein' that's my name,

Charity Douglas."

To this letter were appended three different postscripts. In the first Madam Conway and Maggie were cordially invited to visit Charlton again; in the second Betsey Jane sent her regrets; while in the third Madam Conway was particularly requested to excuse haste and a bad pen.

"Disgusting creature!" was Madam Conway's exclamation, as she finished reading the letter; then, tossing it into the fire, she took up another one, which had come by the same mail and was from Theo herself.

After dwelling at length upon the numerous calls she made, the parties she attended, the compliments she received and her curiosity to know why her grandmother came back that day, she spoke of her recent visit in Charlton.

"You have been there, it seems," she wrote, "so I need not particularize, though I know how shocked and disappointed you must have been; and I think it very kind in you not to have said anything upon the subject, except that you called there, for George reads all my letters, and I would not have his feelings hurt. He had prepared me in a measure for the visit, but the reality was even worse than I anticipated. And, still, they are the kindest-hearted people in the world, while Mr. Douglas is a man, they say, of excellent sense. George never lived at home much, and their heathenish ways mortify him, I know, though he never says a word, except that they are his parents.

"People here respect George, too, quite as much as if he were a Conway, and I sometimes think they like him all the better for being so kind to his old father, who comes frequently to the store. Grandma, I begin to think differently of some things from what I did. Birth and blood do not make much difference in this country, at least; and still I must acknowledge that I should feel dreadfully if I did not love George and know that he is the kindest husband in the world."

The letter closed with a playful insinuation that as Henry Warner had gone, Maggie might possibly marry Arthur Carrollton, and to make amends for the disgrace which Theo had unwittingly brought upon the Conway line.

Roused Her Interest:

"My dear, you ought to pass up frivolous things and take an interest in deep subjects. Take history, for instance. Here is an interesting item. Gessler, the tyrant, put up a hat for the Swiss to salute."

The lady was a trifle interested.

"How was it trimmed?" she inquired.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON III.

July 18, 1915.—Solomon Chooses Wisdom.—1 Kings 3: 4-15.

Commentary.—I. Solomon's sacrifice (v. 4). 4. To Gibeon—Gibeon was five or six miles northwest of Jerusalem, and was a sacred place because the tabernacle and brazen altar were there (2 Chron. 1: 3, 5). The great high place—Idolatrous nations chose hilltops as places for their religious ceremonies, perhaps from the supposition that such elevations were nearer their gods. Israel had not yet built the house of the Lord, and they were worshipping Jehovah in high places (1 Kings 3: 2, 3). Gibeon was the most sacred place at that time in all Israel. A thousand burnt offerings—This was a great religious gathering. Multitudes of Israelites went to Gibeon with Solomon to engage in the public worship of the Lord. A small portion only of the slaughtered animal was consumed as a burnt-offering to the Lord, and the remaining portions were eaten by the priests and distributed among the worshippers. Many priests must have been engaged in sacrificing the animals, and there can be no doubt that the people entered heartily into the worship there offered to the Lord. "In 2 Chron. 1: 2, 3 we are told a little more about this sacrifice. The king had consulted all the people, and the great officers, and went up in a solemn procession with all the people, and the great officers, and went up in a solemn procession with all the congregation. This accounts for the abundance of the offerings. After this occasion we hear no more of sacrifices at Gibeon."—Lumby.

II. The Lord's offer (v. 5). 5. The Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream—There are many instances in the scriptures of the Lord's appearing to individuals in dreams to communicate to them a knowledge of His will. Such dreams are to be carefully distinguished from ordinary dreams, for the ordinary dream has no significance. It can reasonably be supposed that Solomon realized the weight of the responsibility that was upon him as king of Israel, and his prayer had been that the Lord would grant him the needed help to meet that responsibility. Ask what I shall give thee—The offer made by the Lord to the youthful king was comprehensive and unlimited. The Lord, in this statement, laid His resources at Solomon's disposal. All that the human heart could rightfully desire is included. It is easy to imagine what multitudes would choose if they were given such a privilege. The Lord knew what was in Solomon's heart when He laid open His resources to him.

III. Solomon's choice (vs. 6-9). 6. Solomon said—He said this in his dream. Hast showed ...... great mercy—Solomon prefaced his choice with humble acknowledgments to God for mercies bestowed, and a confession of his own inability to fill the position in which he had placed him. The Lord had shown great mercy to David throughout his eventful career. In uprightness of heart David's course for the most part was right, and for the sins into which he fell, he had deeply and fully repented. Hast given him a son to sit on his throne—David had several sons in all, but the Lord definitely declared that his son Solomon should be king. 7. I am but a little child—Solomon was probably about twenty years of age at this time. He was a man grown, yet he realized that in experience in great affairs he was but a child. In this frame of mind he could accept of the wisdom that God would directly or indirectly impart, and his sense of the need of assistance was evidence of his fitness to rule. To go out or come in—In these words the king declared to the Lord that he did not know how to conduct the affairs of the kingdom. 8. Thou hast chosen—God had chosen Abraham, and the people of Israel were his descendants. That cannot be numbered—Israel had come to be a great nation. According to David's numbering there were 1,300,000 men of war (2 Sam. 24: 9), and upon that basis there were possibly 6,000,000 inhabitants of Israel. 9. An understanding heart—This was a noble choice. It was unselfish. He might have chosen popularity, wealth, vast dominion or long life, but he left himself out of the consideration to the extent that he chose for the highest welfare of his subjects. To judge ...... people—The Oriental mind always associates the functions of the judge with the monarch, as he is expected to hear and decide important cases.—Whedon.

IV. Gifts bestowed (vs. 10-15). 10. The speech pleased the Lord—The Lord was pleased with the humility, sincerity, unselfishness and devotion to Israel expressed in Solomon's request. This opened the way for the Lord to bestow the best gift and to supplement it with other desirable gifts. 11. Hast not asked for thyself, etc.—Solomon, in his simplicity, had a clear understanding of values, and this understanding the Lord quickly recognized. The Lord made plain what things human nature prized highly. To discern judgment—The ability to hear causes, to weigh evidence and to render just judgment. 12. I have done according to thy words—Solomon's request was granted. I have given thee a wise heart—God gave him ability to know and to judge. This wisdom was both supernatural and natural. We know that Solomon studied and searched, and thus stored up knowledge as others do, but the Lord gave him a breadth of comprehension and an insight that he did not possess before that eventful night. None like thee—Read 1 Kings 4: 29-34 for a statement regarding Solomon's grasp of mind. 13. That which thou hast not asked—He had asked for something that would be of the greatest advantage to others, and the Lord gave him those things that would be desirable for himself. There is a lesson in what not to pray for, as well as in what to pray for. The words of Solomon's choice and what came of it. Both riches and honor—Solomon's was a magnificent reign. 14. If thou wilt walk in my ways—God gave promise of long life to the king, but it was conditional. The sacred historian had to record the painful fact later, that Solomon was drawn away from the service of the true God to a great extent by the associations he formed. What might Solomon had been had he followed the Lord all his days! Lengthen thy days—He failed to meet the conditions and only lived about sixty years. 13. It was a dream—Even though it was a dream, it was a divine communication to Solomon. The choice the king expressed in his dream, was the choice of his waking heart. Wisdom was his to rule Israel wisely, and riches and honor were in store for him. Stood before the ark of the covenant—David had brought the ark to Jerusalem in the early part of his reign.

QUESTIONS.—At about what age did Solomon begin to reign? Where did he go to sacrifice? How great a sacrifice did he make? Who went with him? What did the Lord tell him to ask? What choice did Solomon express? What reasons did he give for making this request? What did the Lord say to Solomon? What promises did the Lord make to Solomon? What is the source of wisdom?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—A Prayer for Wisdom.

I. Based on personal need.

II. Made on behalf of others.

I. Based on personal need. The lesson before us is the record of a dream which Solomon had at Gibeon, a celebrated place in Old Testament history. It reveals what then agitated and filled his soul. It affords evidence of the genuine theocratic spirit in which the son of David had been educated. The young king seemed overwhelmed with a sense of responsibility. He was about to succeed a father who had been renowned as a warrior, a statesman and a ruler of men. He was about to reign over a numerous and prosperous people. The dream seemed to be according to the measure of his capacity. His great soul took within the ample range of its conception the whole Jewish nation, the eternal Ruler of the universe and the everlasting principles of moral obligation. The divine communication at the beginning of the dream was Solomon's authority to pray according to the strongest desires of his heart. His dominant thought from which spontaneously sprang his prayer, was that of the immensity of his task and his incapacity to perform it. He foresaw that there would be snares not easy to avoid, difficulties hard to surmount. He dared not go forth without answered prayer. He recognized that God had made him king, but so far as wisdom and ability were concerned he was still a child. When God came to him with so great an offer, the first thing that came to Solomon's mind was the image and memory, the life and character of his father. His record was a guide to a right choice. He referred to what God had done for his father as an example and pledge of what he could do for him. It was not presumptuous for Solomon to take God at his word. It was not his own merit that gave him courage to pray as he did, but the divine mercy and grace which his father had so richly experienced. His reference to former victories in the household and the realm gave evidence that he was alert and thoughtful. Solomon considered his youth and inexperience. His prayer was short, but it expressed living, childlike faith, simple and substantial, heartfelt and true. His choice was an act of judgment, a decision of his will.

II. Made in behalf of others. Solomon felt that, to take the place of his father and direct the destinies of Israel, he needed that wisdom which God alone can bestow. It was no little matter to be called upon to govern so important a nation as Israel. Solomon knew that without God's guiding spirit he could not do it successfully. He therefore chose wisdom and knowledge to qualify himself for the task. Higher wisdom was needed for higher work, for guiding and governing a nation. Solomon had a lofty ideal of kingly rule before him. He wished to rule God's people well for their own good, and the glory of their supreme ruler. His prayer that he might be just in judgment and equitable in law. His prayer displayed a deep interest in the welfare of his subjects. God was well pleased because Solomon chose what would enable him to be serviceable to others. His choice marked a new epoch. Before his time, all kingly power was marked by standing armies, by riches and pomp. Under his reign was demonstrated for the conquests of nations and men. The prayer of his dream was answered in his actual history. That Solomon "loved the Lord" was the best and greatest thing that could be said about him. When God put the character test upon him he revealed the truth of his own relation to God, and his attitude toward men. His was the reverent prayer of a royal petitioner. It was characterized by gratitude solemnity, hopefulness and humility. Spiritual interests were supreme. Spiritual motives were predominant. The faithfulness of God was his stimulus to prayer. In David's dying charge to Solomon he reminded him of God's words, "If thy children take heed." Solomon made that declaration the basis of his plea with God in his prayer for personal enlightenment for the sake of God's people. Solomon's choice of the best gifts proved him worthy of lesser gifts. God's beneficence exceeded his requests. T. R. A.

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last, the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE's editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unmatched in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers, and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent. in THE GLOBE'S circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the women's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

The tide on the Northern battle line has again turned and the Russians are once more pursuing the Austro-German army in Galicia.

The Yorkshire Farmers' Union of Doncaster passed a resolution asking the Government to discourage recruiting in districts where agricultural labor is scarce.

The British Admiralty announces that out of 20,000 sailings to and from the port of Liverpool the German submarines got twenty. And Berlin calls this a blockade.

Botha's veterans, if they are sent to the help of the Allies in Europe, will be well prepared to face the Huns. The poisoned wells of South west Africa accustomed them to the "frightfulness."

This is the 316 day that the Empire has been at war with Germany. Eleven months ago Saturday, Aug 10, France declared war on Austria-Hungary. Britain declared war on the Dual Monarchy two days later.

The German regular forces in German Southwest Africa which surrendered to Gen Botha, numbered 204 officers and 3,166 men, it was officially announced. They turned over 37 field cannon and twenty-two machine guns.

Germany is trying to bribe Bulgaria and Roumania with huge slices of territory she doesn't possess, a sort of promissory note to be met after the Teutons have conquered. They will probably prefer the hard cash of the Allies to taking chances with Germany.

It is claimed that the submarine which sunk the Lusitania has been captured by the British and her crew placed in prison. Would there not be a more contented feeling if these pirates were made to walk the plank or sent to the electric chair as a warning to their fellow pirates?

The Walkerton magistrates who on Saturday fined three Hanover youths $300 and costs for selling liquor without a license, are in some quarters having some unpleasant things said about them. True enough, the fine was an exceptionally heavy one, but as the youths it is alleged persisted in breaking the law, the fine was perhaps justifiable and will be an object lesson to others in this locality who are perhaps just as guilty of breaches of the law as they.

ENGLISH PAPER IS RIGHT

In the Canadian expeditionary force there are said to be several German Canadians, who regard it as a great insult to be called Germans, having no sympathy at all with the Kaiser and his Huns, says an English paper.

PRUSSIAN FRIGHTFULNESS

"I planned to take the dynamite in the room with me and cut a hole in the door and have the food shoved in through it. I planned to keep them (Mrs Morgan and children) there until Mr. Morgan gave me his promise that the exportation of war munitions would stop. Unless he stopped it I would tell him of my intention to kill Mrs. Morgan and the children and myself by exploding the dynamite."

This from the German, Holt, is a curious sidelight on the mental makeup of the modern Teuton, says the Ottawa Journal. It is an illustration of the frightfulness and blatt which have characterized German policy since the beginning of the war. Holt, whether crazy or sane seems to have been compelled by the same peculiar ideas which prompted murder, pillage and plunder in Belgium, the shelling of Rheims, the dropping of bombs on undefended coast towns of England, and destruction of non-combatants on high seas. All these served no possible military purpose, but were designed and carried out with the idea that they would cow the victims into a spirit of surrender. Holt, by the same policy of frightfulness, hoped to cow J. Pierpont Morgan from doing legitimate business with the allied governments.

The Centenary of Peace

It is a hundred years since the Treaty of Ghent ended the last war between the British Empire and the United States of America—for a full century two great powers, with interests which occasionally conflicted and with tempers which not invariably conciliatory, have lived at peace and in steadily increasing goodwill. Plans were on foot to celebrate this great event, and had not Fate—and Germany—willed otherwise, this summer would have seen a celebration of great magnitude and of exceptional interest and value. But the war came. Canadians are bending all their energies, and devoting all their thoughts to the work of fighting for the British Empire, and our friends in the United States have been confronted with anxious and absorbing problems. In the circumstances, the plans for a great commemoration between the Great Empire and the Great Republic had to be reconsidered. Those in charge of the movement, after consulting the leading men connected with it both in Canada and the United States, decided on a modified programme. That aspect of the plans which contemplated public rejoicing has been postponed, but those portions—the larger portions, it should be said—of the plans, which laid emphasis on education and on the cultivation of a reasonable frame of mind in the conduct of international relations are being prosecuted. The public rejoicings are only postponed and the organizations formed to carry out the commemoration were encouraged to continue their work of preparation and education, so that when the war is over and victory has crowned the British and allied forces, fitting festivities might be held. These festivities are likely to be all the more impressive in view of the fact that we shall be celebrating not only the conclusion of a century of peace with our neighbors but the overthrow of those forces which have, for so many years, menaced the peace of the whole world. The Canadian Peace Centenary Association—which, by the way, is not and never has been a "Peace Society" has just issued a pamphlet which sheds an interesting light on the temper prevailing between the Canadian and American peoples. The ratification of the Treaty of Ghent took place on February 17th, 1815, and on the centenary date great numbers of messages were exchanged between the President of the Canadian Peace Centenary Association, Sir Edmund Walker, and the Governors of the States, between cities and towns on both sides of the line; between Boards of Trade, and even between individual firms and correspondents across the border. These are printed in the pamphlet, and bear witness to a cordiality of spirit which affords a welcome contrast to the dark animosities which make other continents so dreadful a spectacle today. These messages display a wonderful unanimity of conviction, and it may be added that many of those from the neighboring Republic convey the heartiest good wishes for the success of our cause. Another feature of the pamphlet is the description of the services held on Sunday, February 14, in an extraordinary number of churches in both countries. The public celebrations of this triumph of reasonableness and goodwill should be one of the earliest events after the conclusion of the present dreadful struggle. The Canadian Peace Centenary Association, and its corresponding body in the United States, the American Peace Centenary Committee, have made all the necessary preparations, and it is to be hoped that their work will be crowned with success.

Strange Chicken Disease

A strange disease has recently been noticed by some of the chicken fanciers at Clinton. Chickens seem to be well and hearty and scratching around, then in a few moments fall dead, or seem to loose the use of their limbs, at least before expiring. One man has lost eighteen fine birds, another seven, and another nine. They cannot fathom this strange malady. All the chickens thus dying have reached the size when they would dress at about one and a half pounds.

Getting Something for Nothing

Joseph Hassell, an Englishman, who has been working in Kinloss, has at last got into business that is making him some easy money. He is selling membership cards for the Co-operative Union, who offers 100 lbs of Redpath's best granulated sugar for the sum of $1.00. The retail price of this sugar is $7.10 and the wholesale price is in the neighborhood of $6.70. Hassell secured several members for the Union en route to Ripley and is going to get rich quick. The Wingham Advance in last week's issue says: "People who had dealings with the Co-operative Agent in the vicinity of Goderich township, report him to be a fraud." Mr. Hassell can find sale in Ripley for a carload of sugar as our merchants would be money in pocket to place their orders where they can buy cheaper than a wholesale house.—Ripley Express.

Sex vs Science

We cannot escape from the fact that sex attraction is the great event in human life. Sex is the controlling force in nearly all of human efforts. War, for instance, is only an exaggerated form of the sex instinct. Neither literature nor art would exist in any appreciable degree without sex. Men work, fight, sing, paint, live and die for the love of a woman. In only one field of human activity is there no taint of sex feeling, and that is science. Science is cold and the imagination of the explorer and dispassionate; it has the imagination but not the lover. Science has only one aim and end—the discovery of truth. Science is another world from the hot earth of economic and military competition, which have for their ends the attainment of love and marriage. Through science mankind will gradually throw off some of its sex slavery and reach a new and possibly happier stage in its development.

Bad Holiday Fire

Dominion Day in Mount Forest was ushered in by the biggest fire it has had for a good while, resulting in the destruction of the roof and most of the interior of the Corner Store block opposite the post office. It was nearly half past four in the morning when Miss Mable Smith of the post office was aroused by the breaking of glass and she at once gave the alarm. The fire apparently began near the centre or towards the rear of H. W. Palmateer's store, ticket, express and telegraph office. The origin is a mystery, possibly from a smouldering fire started by a cigar spark or by lightning carried along the telegraph wires. Parties who returned to town at three o'clock say there was no sign of fire then. When first observed the whole interior was ablaze downstairs. Mr. Palmateer had delivered most of the express the evening before fortunately. He has his residence above the store, but Mrs. Palmateer and daughter were visiting in Walkerton and Mr. Palmateer lodged outside. His loss above insurance of $1500 on stock and $600 on furniture he places at over $1580. Six months ago he allowed a policy of 000 to lapse.—Mt. Forest Confederate

KIDNEY DISEASE WAS KILLING HIM

Until He Used "Fruit-a-tives" The Great Kidney Remedy

HARROWSMITH, ONT., Aug. 26th, 1913.

"About two years ago, I found my health in a very bad state. My Kidneys were not doing their work and I was all run down in condition. Having seen 'Fruit-a-tives' advertised, I decided to try them. Their action was mild, and the result all that could be expected.

My Kidneys resumed their normal action after I had taken upwards of a dozen boxes and I regained my old-time vitality. Today, I am as well as ever."

Crank Car While in Gear

Even an experienced autoist will meet with trouble. Last Monday Dr. Hay was cranking his car preparatory to taking a trip, when he unfortunately discovered that the car was still in gear, or the brake was only partially down. The car moved towards him, hit his chin and he tried to stop it. However, he was thrown down and the front wheel went over his body, but the hind wheel did not altogether get over him, his body stopped the motion, and a number at the Arlington who saw the accident went to the rescue. As it was the doctor had a rib fractured, and his shoulder was severely injured, still he is going around and attending to his practice.—Wiarton Canadian.

An Accurate Prophecy

The ancient Hebrew prophet never saw an automobile, so far as we know, but if he had, could he in much more accurate language have described it than when he said, "The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall jostle one against another in the broad ways: they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings."

Carry 569 Pound Man to Grave on Dray

The funeral of the largest man in Elgin County took place on July 1st in the township of Bayham. His name was John H. Dennis and he lived all his life on the farm where he died. When eleven years old he weighed 200 pounds, and at his death his weight was 569 pounds. His waist measure was nine feet, his chest eight feet, the casket was 30 by 30 by 6 feet and the body had to be carried outside and put into it where it lay, under a tent. Twelve men placed the casket on a dray.

If civilization wins against barbarity the United States can say that the allies had the sympathy, but if the ideals of twenty centuries of Christian civilization go down to defeat before the Huns then it would not appear that it was the same nation which fought for the liberation of the slaves.—Wiarton Canadian Echo.

Raised Price of Meals

The hotelkeepers of St. Marys have printed notices out now, since the carrying of the temperance act, raising the price of meals to 40c. The price of stabling is also raised, and there will be no more free sheds for horses. Single horses in shed will be charged five cents. The temperance act does not come into force until May 1916 as licenses have been granted and paid for up to that time.

He is a fine young man and his many friends are hoping great things for him.—Southampton Beacon.

Some Facts about the Toad.

The toad lives from two to forty years and it can lay over a thousand eggs a year. It has lived two years without food, but can't live long under water. It never takes dead or motionless food. It captures and devours wasps, yellow jackets, ants beetles worms, spiders, snails bugs, grasshoppers, crickets, weevils, caterpillars, moths, etc. In twenty-hours the toad consumes enough food to fill its stomach four times. A single toad will devour over 10,000 insects. If every ten of these would do one cent damage the toad saved ten dollars. Evidently the toad is a valuable friend to the farmer, gardener and fruit grower, and can be made especially useful to the green house, the garden and berry patch.

Germans Surrender Colony

Gen. Botha, commander of the forces of the Union of South Africa has accepted the surrender of all German military forces in German South-west Africa. The Germans surrendered unconditionally, following the issuance of General Botha's ultimatum, which expired at five o'clock Thursday evening. With the exception of the necessary army of occupation the citizens army will be brought home as quickly as possible. Following the foregoing despatch news of the surrender of the entire German force in German South-west Africa closes one of the most important campaigns of the great war, and releases for service elsewhere the South African contingent. The campaign against the most important German African colony was considered so vital that all the resources of the South African Union were used in it but it's successful conclusion probably means that despite the fact that German East Africa remains unconquered a contingent will be despatched to France, while additional forces will continue the campaign in East Africa. The final disposition of German South-west Africa has not been officially announced, but it is generally believed here that it will become a part of the South African Union.

Closed Up.

On Wednesday evening June 30th at eight o'clock every bar room in the Province of Saskatchewan closed its doors, and the business of selling drinks was ended—it is hoped—for ever. Club selling went with bar-room selling, and the only source of supply remaining for the bibulously inclined will be the few Government shops in which all sale will be under very rigid restrictions. Even the Government shops may be wiped out of any district by a majority vote of the local municipal electors.

Recruiting for New Quota

Lieut. Harold Young, Hanover, was appointed as the officer in charge of the quota of thirty-two men from the thirty first Regiment for the new regiment which is being recruited at Niagara under Major Ballantyne, D.S.O. Lieut. Young arrived in town this week and is recruiting and drilling the men who will go to camp under him. Already about twelve men have passed the medical examination and are drilling every day. Recruiting, though is slow. Lieut. Young was one of the officers who took the officers training course here in May and he has just returned from Niagara, where he took a three weeks training course.—Owen Sound Sun.

Rev. John MacNeill's Wedding.

A wedding which was full of interest to the people of Toronto was that of the Reverend John MacNeil, B. A. the popular pastor of the Walmer Road Baptist Church, to Miss Olive Harris, on the first day of July. It was held in New York city where the Rev. Mr. MacNeil went to meet his bride, who has recently returned from a year's stay in Europe. The invitations were limited to the members of the family and to a few close friends of the bride and the groom. Among those present were Miss Elizabeth MacNeill and Miss Annie MacNeill, the sister of the groom, and principal MacNeill of Woodstock, his brother. Other guests from Toronto were Mrs. C. J. Holman, a friend of the bride, and Professor and Mrs. Franklin Johnson jr. of the University of Toronto. Among the others in the audience were Mrs. C. A. Eaton and the Misses Eaton of New York, Professor MacIntosh of Yale University, Mrs. Culham, Miss Culham, Miss Copp, and Mrs. Slater of Hamilton, Ont. Dr. Culham of Viceroy, Sask., and Miss Watson of South Nyack N. Y. This ceremony was solemnized in the beautiful Madison Avenue Baptist Church of New York city, the chancel of which was decorated with annunciation lilies and the ferns. The officiating clergyman was the Rev. Charles Aubry Eaton, D. D., a warm personal friend of the groom, and well known in Toronto where he was for some time the pastor of the Bloor Street Baptist Church. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. MacNeill left for the Adirondacks, where they will spend the summer.—Toronto Star.

Reading Advertisements

NEWSPAPERS would be much less enjoyable, instructive and valuable than they are if they contained no advertisements. Many persons read the advertisements quite as thoroughly as they read the news matter. This is just as it should be.

The more advertising, the more buying. The more buying, the greater consumption of the goods or service advertised.

More business would be done by the merchants of Walkerton if they advertised more, and if more of them advertised. Much business goes to the big city mail-order houses because they advertise. These houses would cease to draw business from this community if they ceased to advertise.

To the Merchants of Walkerton

Advertise more, and more of you advertise, and the big city mail-order houses will get less and less business from this community and you will get more.

Old Country News

DANGEROUS SPY DEPORTED.

Bertha Trost, a well-known figure in the west end and probably one of the most dangerous as well as one of the most evil women in London, has just been turned out of the country as an undesirable alien by order of the Home Office.

A painted and powdered old woman, with hooked nose, brown-green eyes, grey Victorian side curls, and wearing a poke bonnet with broad velvet ribbons, flowered silk and a crinoline, Mme. Bertha Trost was often to be seen driving about the west end of London and in Hyde Park behind two fine grey horses. She lolled luxuriously in her open carriage, packed up with silken cushions, and holding a tiny flowered-silk parasol over her head with a withered old hand half hidden by diamonds and by black silk mittens. Everyone turned to look at her and she was never better pleased than when attracting attention.

She combined her two "roles" as "beauty specialist" and "antiquary healer" at a shop, No. 15c Clifford street. Her clients were distinguished of both sexes and of all ages. Mme. Bertha would act as hostess, performing introductions, trotting about with a silver cigarette box, pouring tea, arranging night parties, and the rest. She would discuss affairs of state and affairs of military and naval importance. Learning a little bit here, a little there, she would join her fragments of knowledge together till she could give the appearance of knowing all about a subject and thereby disarm any cautious client into more open discussion. She was a famous talker, and, it is said, could extract information most efficiently.

The difficulty of proving that she was a recognized and paid spy of Germany lies in the fact that she passed on information not by writing but most probably by word of mouth to more highly placed people in the spy service of Germany and Austria, who found means of getting her information to their employers.

It was in the week before last that Mme. Trost got to know that the Home Office were inquiring about her, and, knowing that she was an alien and liable as such to deportation, she determined to become an Englishwoman—by the simple act of marrying an Englishman. In this she was disappointed by her deportation.

AIR RAID RUMORS.

Since the censorship has shut down on the publication of the details of the visits of German aircraft, London is full of daily rumors that spread all over town. There has been no general criticism of withholding the locality of the raids, as it may be helpful to the Germans to hear where their bombs dropped. But suppression of details has had its customary effect, and every day there are stories of raids that never happened and of destruction that never took place. In fairness to the censors it should be admitted that while their facts when published are meagre, they are regarded as true, though the delay in issuing them is hopelessly needless from a newspaper point of view. In the case of the worst raid, happening around midnight as usual, the facts were not published in time for the regular issues of the afternoon papers of the following day. Meanwhile rumors had piled on rumors, and the man in the street was prepared to hear that hundreds had been killed.

INCREASED WAGES

The Board of Trade Labor Gazette states that during the five months ended 31st of May, 1915, 1,987,444 workpeople are reported to have had their wages increased by £343,374 per week, or an average of nearly 3s 6d per head. In the corresponding period of 1914, 512,092 workpeople sustained a net decrease of £8,036 per week.

All the amounts stated are exclusive of increased earnings due to overtime and also of changes affecting agricultural laborers, seamen, railway servants, police and Government employees. Considerable bodies of workpeople in each of these occupations have received increases or war bonuses.

The coal mining industry accounted for about half of the total increase and the engineering and shipbuilding trades for a little less than half of the remainder.

DEMAND FOR SERVANTS.

Domestic servants, already scarce before the war, have become rarer, owing to the demands for their services as—

Railway ticket collectors, porters and bookstall clerks.

Grocery shop assistants and waitresses in hotels and restaurants.

Messengers and munition workers.

Workers on the land.

JUSTICE-PEER WORKS ON MUNITIONS.

Lord Norbury, former Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, has taken employment as a fitter in an aeroplane factory in a London suburb. He will put in 13 hours daily at his work.

At the same time, Lady Norbury had begun work as a waitress in a soldiers' coffee canteen at Euston station.

A TRAMPLESS ENGLAND.

The war has brought what might be described as a trampless era to England. There is not a workhouse in the United Kingdom that has not reported a great decrease in the number of vagrants during the past few months. Those who still use the "casual wards" are men of sixty years or over. Officials say there are practically no young or middle aged vagrants left.

WOMEN AS "POSTIES."

The Postmaster-General has decided to make a trial at substituting women's labor for that of men in delivering mail. The first of the new women postmen will be employed at Epsom. If the experiment is successful, it is expected to be generally adopted within a short time.

NOTES.

Mr. Harold Houlbrook, organist of Valley Road United Methodist Mission Church, Sheffield, has given up his post and joined the Royal Marines.

Mr. William Bashforth is the first Sheffield city councillor to enlist. He has joined the 2nd-4th York and Lancaster Regiment (Hallamshire Rifles) as a private. He is a married man with a family.

The sympathy of many friends in Sheffield musical circles will be extended to Dr. John Duffell, of Millhouses Lane, in the death of his wife, which occurred on Monday after an illness extending over nearly a year.

On Sunday afternoon a week ago the body of an old man was recovered from the Iron Wheel Dam, Rivelin, and taken to the Sheffield Public Mortuary. There the body was subsequently identified as that of Walter Morrison, 65, of 170 Northfield road, Crookes, who had been missing since the previous Tuesday.

A general district rate of 2s 10d in the £—a decrease of 2s on the last one—has been adopted by Worsbro' (U. D.) Council.

The new vicar read himself in at Bolterstone on Sunday, a week ago, to a large congregation and preached at Deepcar to a large congregation in the evening.

It was reported at the meeting of the Council of the Yorkshire Miners' Association that since the last meeting 57 members had been killed at the front, making a total of 162 since the outbreak of war. The association has paid the death benefit of £6 in each case.

The Leeds city magistrates appointed Mr. William Thornton to the position of clerk to the justices, held by his father, the late Mr. John Thornton, who occupied the post since 1872. The salary is to be £600, the amount paid to the late Mr. Thorton on his appointment. Mr. W. Thornton assisted his father for 25 years.

Wounded soldiers are allowed to ride free of charge on the Matlock trams.

£500 was realized as a result of the Serbian flag day in Derby.

Mr. F. Crossland, farmer, has been returned unopposed as an additional Rural District Councillor for Bamford.

Fifty more men of the Matlock district have joined the colors, since the present campaign opened. Captain Seymour is the recruiting officer.

The Heanor magistrates declared that all clubs in the petty sessional area shall be subject to the same closing restrictions on Sundays as public houses.

The rector of Matlock (Canon J. W. Kewley) has announced that the names of Matlock men who fall in the war are to find a permanent place on the walls of the Parish Church.

A roll of honor of the men from Whitwell, Hodthorpe and Steetley, who are serving with the colors, has been placed in the Whitwell parish church, and contains 280 names.

Sir Herbert Raphael, M. P. for South Derbyshire, who joined the 2nd Sportsman's Battalion as a private, has obtained a commission, and is now raising the 18th Battalion of the King's Own Rifles.

Mr. Thos. Wheeldon, J. P., Whinneymoor House, was returned unopposed to represent the South Ward on the Retford Town Council in place of the Rev. T. Morgan, J. P., deceased.

At a meeting of the Hucknall Council, a letter was read from Mr. H. J. Ellis, son of the late the Hon. J. E. Ellis, M. P., offering the Public Hall as a free gift to the town. The offer was gratefully accepted.

General Sir Bruce M. Hamilton was gazetted commander of the Ripon town training centre.

Brevet Lieut.-Col. Prince Alexander of Teck was gazetted a General Staff Officer second grade.

Mr. Braughton took the oath and his seat in the House of Commons in the room of Mr. Tobin, resigned.

The King has approved the appointment of the Right Hon. C. Scott Dickson, K. C., to be Lord Justice Clerk, in succession to Lord Kingsburgh (resigned).

Mr. William Rogers, of Berwick Basset, Wiltshire, himself an old soldier has eight sons serving with the colors.

Of 462 members of the Liverpool police who have joined the forces, 21 have already been killed in action.

Tired and exhausted with their wanderings, the two German prisoners who escaped from Shrewsbury camp have been recaptured.

Mrs. Basford, the wife of a Hull seaman, of Churchill street, Hedon road, has received the King's bounty of £3. A week ago she gave birth to triplets.

There were four deaths from spotted fever at Birmingham last week, making a total of twenty six deaths out of thirty-two cases that have occurred in the city.

Members of the Burton-on-Trent Volunteer Training Corps have decided to spend their time, including Sundays, if necessary, in assisting local farmers with the harvesting.

Hull shipowners have decided to concede an additional 5s a week as a war bonus, making the wages on weekly boats with the bonus £2 1s, and on monthly boats with the war bonus £8 16s.

Two further deaths, making 166 to date, arising out of the Gretna railway accident were reported at an inquest opened at Carlisle.

The Rev Daniel Hughes, the well-known Monmouthshire Baptist minister and ex-County Councillor, has enlisted.

The Rev. John Ludlow Lopes, formerly curate in charge of St. Francis', Saltley, and founder of St. Edmund's Hostel at Deritend, has been received into the Roman Catholic Church.

At Bristol John Junos, 16, a Greek seaman, was remanded charged with the murder of Johann Kaiks, boatswain of a vessel lying near Portishead. It was stated that on the previous day there was an altercation between the two men, and the defendant inflicted upon the boatswain injuries which resulted in death.

The Birmingham Watch Committee has authorized the engagement of boys up to 18 years as conductors on tramway-cars and motor-omnibuses.

The 5,000 miners who were on strike in the Merthyr Tydvil district resumed work, having effected a compromise on the non-union question.

The death is anounced of Mr. James Thompson, a well-known temperance reformer of Sussex, aged 90 years.

Mr. John Ward, ex-Chief Constable of Huddersfield, died at his residence, Arran Villa, St. Alban's road, Bootle, Liverpool, at the age of 66 years.

The death occurred at the age of 73, of Lord Addington, the second baron. He twice represented the County of Buckingham in Parliament in the Conservative interest. The heir to the barony is the eldest son, the Hon. John Gellibrand.

A trout scaling 3½ lbs. landed by Dr. Morse at Abingdon is believed to be the largest caught in the Thames for some years.

Week before last should have been in any usual year "May" week at Cambridge. Thousands of people would have lined both sides of the river watching 273 men taking part in the bumping races. This year a handful of undergraduates followed a four-oared race between St. Catherine's and King's, the only two colleges able to put on even a racing four.

The Rev. Henry Fisher, father of the headmaster of Repton (the Rev. G. F. Fisher), died at Leamington. For forty-two years he was rector of Higham-on-the-Hill, Leicestershire. The living has been in the Fisher family in direct descent for four generations, and is now held by Mr. Henry Fisher's eldest son.

During the round of visits he made in Norwich last week-end the city's famous son, "Dan, V. C." (Sergeant-Major Daniels, 2nd Rifle Brigade) has done much to stimulate recruiting by his straightforward, soldierly speeches.

Realising the value of their services to the country at the present time, miners at the Langwith Colliery, Mansfield, have broken their custom, dating back thirty-eight years, of declining to work the day after a fatal accident underground as a mark of respect for the victim.

The teachers and pupils of the Nottingham Girls' High School are sending two hours a day in weeding a five-acre wheatfield in the village of Gedling, three miles from Nottingham. The owner, a woman, was unable to obtain men, and offered a handsome subscription to any patriotic fund if volunteers would clear the wheatfield.

Pte. E. A. Ryall, of the Robin Hood Rifles, who attended the funeral in Nottingham of a comrade, Private Charles Curran, was first struck by the fatal bullet. The two friends were together in a trench, when the bullet knocked several of Ryall's teeth out, passed through his cheek, and finally lodged in Curran's head.

After an absence of three hours the jury at Oxford Assizes brought in a verdict of Not Guilty against Alfred Holland, indicted for the murder of Mrs. Lucy Mary Strange at Oxford on April 23. Holland stated that on the day of the murder the woman had twice met a man described as "Jack, from London," and had been struck by him. He said he heard the man threaten her. For the prosecution it was urged that Holland was the last man seen with her.

Sold 120 times, a small pig, worth 20s, realized £130 for the Red Cross Society's funds, at Haverhill, Suffolk.

The Rev. J. H Hewlett, Primitive Methodist pastor, Foleshill, has started work as a tramway-car driver. Three other Nonconformist ministers are working in munition factories in the same district.

London County Council tramway receipts for the three weeks of the strike fell £77,412.

Among recent recruits at Apsley End, Bedfordshire, was a man with a wife and eleven children.

No one in the Navy Forces has since the war suffered death on conviction by court-martial, Mr. Balfour states.

The Rev. E. Melville Durbin, pastor of the Centenary Baptist Church, March, Cambridgeshire, has taken up duties in a London business house in order to enable a man to enlist.

The body of a Jermyn street butcher named Walker, with his throat cut, was discovered in a lavatory at the Bankruptcy Buildings, where he passed his examination lately. His liabilities were not very heavy.

LOVE LIFE OF A GREAT WOMAN

At 30 years of age the late Florence Nightingale made the following significant entry in her diary: "I had three paths among which to choose. It might have been a literary woman, or a married woman, or a hospital sister." She rejected the first on the grounds that it was better to live than to write, and that "what is not of the first class had better not exist at all." But the second according to her conventional social life, her attractions, physical and mental, the second seemed to be her inevitable destiny, and yet she, as it were, struck past it and made for the third path, at the same time throwing open new spheres of usefulness to women. Sir Edward Cook, in his "Life of Florence Nightingale," argues that she remained single not from lack of opportunity to marry, her life contains fewer records of love affairs than those of most great women, for she was in the truest sense of the word wedded to her work. There were two admirers who caused her some heartburning, one, her cousin, she would on no account consider as a husband, arguing that intermarriage between relatives is in direct contravention of the laws of Nature. That she was not in love with the man is proved by the relief she experienced on learning that he had at last forgotten her. "Cleanse all my love from the desire of creating interest in another's heart," seems to have been her prayer from this time.

AS TO LOVE.

The other attachment was in every way more far-reaching. The suitor remained constant for years, and Florence felt some response to his affection. She could very well distinguish between genuine admiration and hasty inclination, having some years previously written searchingly on this matter to "Brother Jonathan," her friend Miss Hilary Bonham Carter: "It strikes me that in all the most unworldly poetry (both prose and verse) la passion qu'on appelle inclination is treated in a very extraordinary way. When one finds a comparative stranger becoming all of a sudden more essential to one that one's family (via flatters, in general, of one sort or another) one is content with saying to oneself, 'Oh! that's love,' instead of saying, 'How unjust and how blind this feeling is.' I wonder whether, if people were to examine, they would not find (whatever it may ripen to afterward) this feeling at first is generally begun by vanity or jealousy or self-love; and that what is very much to be guarded against, instead of submitted to, is the stranger's admiration and I suppose everybody has been susceptible at one time of their lives having more effect upon one than one's own family." Sir Edward Cook expresses his conviction that Miss Nightingale felt drawn to this lover, believed in his sincerity, found great pleasure in his society. Why, then, when the marriage was favorably regarded by all her friends, and not uncongenial to herself, did she refuse the proposal and stand by that refusal? The biographer answers in this wise: "She turned away from a path to which she was strongly drawn in order to pursue an ideal."

HER REJECTION.

Miss Nightingale's own explanation comes to light in a page of autobiographical notes which relate to this period of her life:

"I have an intellectual nature which requires satisfaction and that would find it in him. I have a passional nature which requires satisfaction, and that would find it in him. I have a moral, an active nature which requires satisfaction, and that would not find it in his life. I can hardly find satisfaction for any of my natures. Sometimes I think that I will satisfy my passional nature at all events, because that will at least secure me from the evil of dreaming. But would it? I could be satisfied to spend a life with him combining our different powers in some great object. I could not satisfy this nature by spending a life with him in making society and arranging domestic things. . . . To be nailed to a continuation and exaggeration of my present life without hope of another would be intolerable to me. Voluntarily to put it out of my power ever to be able to seize the chance of forming for my self a true and rich life would seem to me like suicide."

WAS INCONSISTENT.

Because, in after years, "The Lady of the Lamb," seemed to regard matrimony (especially the marriages of her nurses) with considerable severity, it might be thought that she herself was always cold and passionless. The quoted passage contradicts this, showing that as a young woman she felt attracted to the holy estate, and abandoned it only with a struggle. On her thirtieth birthday (1850) she wrote: "I am 30, the age at which Christ began His mission. Now, no more childish things, no more vain things, no more love, no more marriage. Now, Lord, let me think only of Thy will."

An ideal marriage for a woman, in this heroine's opinion, lay in marrying a man of high and good purpose, and following out that purpose with him. "The highest, the only true love, is when two persons—a man and woman—unite together in some true purpose for mankind and God." On the other hand, she argued with logical clearness that certain women are clearly marked out for the single life, and fitted accordingly for a vocation. How shrewd is her conclusion that "some women have every reason for not marrying, and that for these it is much better to educate the children who are already in the world and can't be got out of it, than to bring more into it!" Women of intellectual and actively moral natures, who married without the perfect ideal, were, to her, sacrificing their higher capacities to the satisfaction of the lower.

THE WORSE-THAN-DEATH MARRIAGE.

Such marriages she deemed worse than death. Writing in her notebook in 1846: "Death is often the gateway to the garden where we shall no longer hunger and thirst after real satisfaction. Marriage, on the contrary, is often an initiation into the meaning of that inexorable word 'Never;' which does not deprive us, it is true, of what 'at their festivals the idle and inconsiderate call life,' but which brings in brought relief and consolation to hundreds of men, and filled the hearts of women and children with love and gratitude. She realized her vocation, and in reality the end of our lives, and the chill of death with it."

Once having resolved upon the single state, Florence never looked back. She followed her path with whole-hearted devotion. It is very doubtful if she could have adapted herself to the uncertain if she ever really loved. By service to the sick and dying she made one man happy.

The skirt is of heavy blue silk embroidered in fine silver threads, and irridescent beads, the bodice is of silver tissue, and silver run lace is used in the pannier and in the short sleeves.

Merely Point of View.

It was about 5 o'clock, and the fading light in the art gallery of the public library was beginning to bother the painter woman who faced the sunset canvas with lumpy palette impaled on one thumb and paint brush held hesitatingly in the other hand, while she scrutinized again the intricate blending of sunset colors and backed away a few steps farther to squint at the perspective of the old whaler she was copying as it lurched in painted waves. Details of color blending, of light and shade, of form after the fashion of a painter's sensitive appreciation, undoubtedly filled her mind.

Then came thumping along the polished floor two other women. They stood for a moment in silence in front of the sunset picture. One of them raised a thick, beringed hand and rubbed the canvas with a slow, feeling rub.

"Ain't it grand, Nellie?" she said. "An' all hand painted, too."—New York Post.

WHY MANKIND CANNOT FLY

Man has always longed to fly like a bird, and all the ancient attempts at flight were based upon the flapping of wings attached to human arms.

These efforts were given up long ago when it was realized that man was not and could not be strong enough to sustain himself in the air by the use of his arms. A man can only just lift himself with his arms—chinning the bar, for example—but he finds himself pretty heavy after he has done it a few times.

The reason why no man will ever be able to fly with self moved wings is that his breastbone is not big enough. A bird's breastbone has along its middle a deep keel, from which spring the enormous muscles that draw down the wings when flapping or hold them level when soaring, the muscles, in other words, that support the entire weight of the bird.

The most powerful fliers have the deepest breastbones. Look at the skeleton of an albatross, a condor or a humming bird in a museum and you will notice that the keel of its breastbone projects like the keel of a racing yacht.

You can see this keel, only much smaller in proportion to the size of the bird, on the carcass of any chicken or turkey after the meat has been removed, and the tender white flesh from the breast is nothing but the muscles with which the bird flew when alive.

You notice that even on a chicken, which is one of the weakest of fliers, this flesh forms the greater part of the body. On a humming bird there is little else but this mass of flying muscle. In other words, the humming bird is nothing but a tiny flying machine.

An albatross has a vast spread of wings, and its small body is little else but a pair of powerful pectoral muscles. These are attached by tendons to the bone called the humerus, which is the counterpart of the upper arm bone of a man. They spread out like a solid fan and are fastened to the breastbone with its deep keel, to the clavicles, or "wishbone," and to the ribs.

A man's breastbone has no keel. His humerus, or upper arm bone, is hinged to the clavicle, or collarbone, and shoulder blade. His pectoral muscles, which move the arm forward, and deltoid muscles, which lift it, are attached to it by strong tendons and spread fanlike over his upper chest, being inserted in the ribs and collar bone.

These are the muscles that do the same work for man as the pectoral muscles do for a bird. These are the muscles on which he would have to rely if he were to fasten wings to his arms and try to fly.

Compare these muscles with those of an albatros and you will see how inadequate they are. Though an albatross weighs only a few pounds, it has pectoral muscles that are actually larger than those of the most powerful athlete.

In order to have muscles powerful enough to lift his weight in the air by flapping wings a man's breastbone would have to develop a keel like a bird's and his collar bone would have to be changed to a giant "wishbone."

Some writer on aviation has calculated that this keel and "wishbone" would have to project at least six feet in order to furnish attachment for the necessary muscles, for man in proportion to his size is far heavier than an albatross. This bird has small and light legs, whereas man's legs are solid and heavy. The albatross' long wing bones are hollow tubes.

This makes it plain why experimenters in flying long ago gave up the idea of self moved wings and flight like that of a bird.—San Francisco Chronicle.

An Old Larch Tree.

Italy can boast of a larch tree the age of which is estimated to be 2,000 years. It is situated on the northern flank of Mount Chetif in the direction of the huts of Plan Veni, above Courmayeur, a few steps from the footpath that skirts the limits of the meadow land. The allowance being made for the extreme slowness with which the larch grows, for the altitude above sea level (1,650 metres) at which it is rooted and for its northerly exposure in the near neighborhood of a glacier, where the cycle of its development is barely five months every year, this venerable larch, untouched alike by woodman's axe and thunderbolt, cannot be less than 2,000 years old.—Scotsman.

RUBBER

Man's desire to move about the earth with comfort has played a tremendous part in increasing the rubber industry in recent years. First came the invention of rubber tires for automobiles, then the making of rubber heels for shoes. Ten years ago, the amount of rubber used for the manufacture of automobile tires in the United States was not worthy mentioning; today thousands upon thousands of tons are used every year for this purpose. As for rubber heels, one New England concern which started on their manufacture less than five years ago is now turning out 20,000 pairs daily.

It would seem that the uses to which rubber can be put are almost inexhaustible, and there seems to be no possibility of its manufacture ever going out of fashion. Inventions calling for the use of rubber are constantly appearing on the market, and they keep coming in an ever-increasing stream.

New rubber goods, which have been put on the market recently, include articles of interest to men, women and children. The daughter of the family, if she is brought up in the way her grandmother might approve, will want to know about a new kind of dishpan, which is rectangular in shape, so that it will fit down into the sink. The pan itself is made of tin, but it is provided with a rubber plug to be used as an outlet, and also has rubber plugs attached to the corners to raise it from the bottom of the sink, and prevent scratching of the porcelain. The son will have his eyes and ears open for news about new athletic accessories made wholly or partly of rubber, such as a new outdoor basketball, which for wearing qualities is claimed to outclass any of its predecessors.

These are only a few of the recent inventions destined to help forward the rubber industry. There are plenty more just as useful, and still more are bound to come. But as has been intimated, even if inventions should suddenly stop, the rubber industry would keep on booming on account of the unprecedented impetus given by the demand for automobile tires, not to mention the lesser, but likewise significant demand for rubber heels, followed, as it has been of late, by a demand for rubber soles.

The rubber industry now has reached such proportions in the United States that hundreds of thousands of tons are brought into the country each year. Where does it come from? The best rubber that a Para rubber, comes from South America, while most of the so-called plantation rubber comes from Ceylon. Any manufacturer will explain that Para rubber comes in biscuits, and Ceylon rubber comes in crepe form.

Rubber biscuits will sound like a joke, but it would be a sizable joke at that, for each one of these biscuits weighs from 50 to 75 pounds. The method of making them is comparatively simple. First the rubber trees are tapped and the sap or latex, as it is termed, caught in cups. Then the latex is poured over a wooden paddle and revolved in a smoking fire until a large ball is formed. A later device calls for the use of a wooden cylinder instead of a paddle, and after the rubber has been smoked it is slipped off the cylinder and cut open, resulting in a flat slab.

Formerly it was the custom in South America to transport the rubber in boats down the river to the place where it was to be put on the steamer. This meant a great expense, as many boats and a large crew were necessary. Now the method is being tried in some places of rafting the rubber down stream. A strong rope is passed through the centre hole in each ball of rubber and the ends are tied together so that the collection resembles a huge string of beads. "A number of these strings are placed one within the other," writes Leo E. Miller in the India Rubber World. "Then a single ball is inserted in the centre, with a flag stuck in it, and the raft is cut loose. On it floats with the current, slowly where the water is quiet, and dashing madly through gorges and over rapids. Two men follow leisurely in a small dugout, always keeping the bobbing flag in sight. At night they paddle up to the raft and tie a lantern to the flagpole; then they follow the light. When the floating mass reaches the end of the journey ropes are fastened to it, and it is moored at the landing, fished out and prepared for the steamer."

After these rubber biscuits have reached the factory they are sliced in somewhat as a watermelon is sliced, and the rubber is washed and ground. In this process there is considerable waste, but with the plantation rubber, which comes in long, corrugated strips, or in crepe form, as it is called, the waste to the manufacturer is much less, because much of the preparatory work has been done before the rubber is received.

In addition to using rubber, which comes directly from South America and Ceylon, factories also use what is called reclaimed rubber; that is, rubber that has been used but once, but still is of sufficient worth to be used again for something else. A Mexican product likewise has been much in evidence in the rubber industry of late years, the juice of the guayule plant. But the present Mexican situation has cut off this source of rubber supply, or, in other words—to quote from a paragraph in the India Rubber World "the humble guayule shrub is deriving a distinct benefit, for it is getting a much needed rest. Three years ago, when the factories were busily extracting its rubber content, it appeared to be approaching a condition of practical extinction, but since the overthrow of the Madero regime, the guayule shrub is about the only thing in Mexico that has been left undisturbed. When the Mexicans settle down for a brief period of tranquility guayule should once more be an interesting feature of the rubber market."

In just the ordinary household the output of the rubber factories is evident in many forms. There may be a rubber mat at the entrance and rubber springs on the door. If electricity is used, doubtless rubber has been employed for insulating the wires. All the steampipes have rubber packing. Rubber appears in some form in every room in the house. There may even be rubber tiling on some of the floors, though this is a luxury more often in stores and offices and libraries. Some day there may be rubber paving on the street that passes the front door, for rubber pavements have already been tried in some cities, and the advantages which they possess may go far in time toward making them popular.

Entire Family Stricken With Cholera.

Youngest Child Died.

The chief symptoms of cholera are vomiting, and purging occurs either simultaneously or alternately, and are usually sudden and very violent, and the matter ejected by the stomach has a bilious appearance and a nasty bitter taste. On the first symptom appearing Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken, and the trouble cured.

Mrs. E. Slade, 376 Logan Ave., Toronto, Ont., writes: "When I first arrived in Canada, nearly four years ago, my entire family was stricken with cholera, from which the youngest child died. Soon after a friend recommended Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and acting on this advice I administered it to all who were suffering, with the most gratifying results. Since that first attack my children have been subject to stomach troubles, but on the first symptoms I resort to "Dr. Fowler's," and it always brings relief. I have immense faith in this medicine, and always keep a bottle on hand. Also I never fail to recommend it to anyone who is similarly troubled."

When you ask for "Dr. Fowler's" see that you get it.

It has been on the market for the past 70 years.

There is nothing "just as good."

QUEER LEGACIES TO MAN.

Such as the Furrow in the Upper Lip and the Appendix.

Run your forefinger around the rim of each ear. You are almost sure to find one of them and quite possibly in both a tiny, hard lump.

It is only a relic of the days when, innumerable hundreds of centuries ago, man was only one of the animals of the wild and had a pointed ear, like a wolf's or dog's.

What good is the little furrow that runs down from the nose to the middle of the upper lip? None. But it, too, has a history. It is a legacy from the time when the human upper lip was in two parts—a hare lip, like that of the cat tribe. This split has healed up long ago, but the new skin is so recent in the history of the race that hair refuses to grow on that furrow.

When a fly settles on you anywhere can you serenely twitch that patch of skin and shake him off? Probably not. But once these old skin muscles, now almost dead after centuries of clothes wearing, were as active as those of a horse. A few—a very few—people can twitch their ears like a dog and do so instinctively when startled, and cases do occasionally occur in which the scalp can be moved at will.

In one very interesting case mentioned in medical books the man could hurl books a couple of yards away simply by twitching the muscles on the top of his head, but, generally speaking, our skin muscles are even more dead nowadays than our ear muscles. We've neglected them. The only set still in use are those we employ when we want to raise our eyebrows.

The appendix is another thing we could do quite well without. It is a relic from old vegetarian days. It has been workless ever since mankind started meat eating and is apt to get in the way.

The large intestine, too, is a thing we really don't need nowadays. The many coils of this long tube are, according to the doctors, quite unnecessary, now mankind has become a flesh eating animal, and merely provides a resting place for germs. Surgeons have often cut out a few odd coils and stitched the ends together. We don't really need to carry a great intestine about with us.

Another thing we don't need much nowadays is the instinct to walk on hands and feet together. You think walking upright the only natural way for man? It isn't. If ever you have to make your way along some narrow plank or some narrow, dizzy mountain ledge, you will find the old instinct strong in you.—Philadelphia North American.

German Helmets.

German military helmets, though made of steel, are as light almost as a cloth cap or a straw hat, and more comfortable than a bowler. Round the inside, where the helmet touches, is a ring of metal "leaf springs" bound with leather, which lightly clips the head to keep the helmet on without heavy pressure. The brass spike or knob that crowned the helmet is made useful as well as ornamental. There are large holes in it, which give very good ventilation to the inside of the helmet—much better than the pinholes that are supposed to ventilate a bowler. In fact, the Germans seem to have succeeded in making a really comfortable bowler out of paper thin steel.—Manchester Guardian.

Her Nerves Were So Bad Thought She Would Go Out of Her Mind.

Mrs. Hollas Knox, 45 Harding St., St. John, N.B., writes: "I suffered greatly with my nerves, I could not sleep at night, nor work, and the least little thing worked on my mind and bothered me. Last winter I thought I would go out of my mind, I would screech out, and my mother really thought I was going crazy with my nerves. It was so terrible I would hold my head and cry. I tried two doctors but they did not do me any good. I thought I would tell you that to-day I am perfectly cured by using three boxes of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, and I can recommend them to all sufferers from nervous troubles so you can tell everyone that they are the only thing that did me any good."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box or 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

FARM AND GARDEN

BUDDING IN THE ORCHARD.

The most important reason for which budding and grafting are practiced is perhaps the fact that most of our fruits do not come true to type from seed, and will not grow readily from cuttings. Also many trees have poor root systems and are not adapted to the existing soil and climatic conditions. This can sometimes be remedied by grafting onto other stock which is of more hardy character. For example, plum trees on peach roots grow better in sandy soil than when on plum roots, and the peach does better in heavy soil when growing on plum roots.

Budding is the operation of removing a bud from one plant and placing it upon another in such a way that it will continue to grow. No amount of skill will make it grow unless the two plants are more or less closely related. The stone fruits—peach, plum, cherry and apricot—may be successfully budded upon each other. This is also true of the pome fruits—apple, pear and quince—or any other similar group of plants. A stone fruit cannot be successfully budded upon a pome fruit, or a pome fruit upon a stone fruit. An apple bud on apple stock are more apt to grow than if placed upon either pear or quince stock, and the corresponding relation holds true with all other groups of plants. The more closely related the plants the more successful will be the operation.

The operation can be performed in either the spring or late summer. If one desires to bud in the spring, the twigs from which the buds are to be taken should be cut in early winter and stored in moist and in a cool place until growth has started in the trees. They should be of good, healthy growth and from 1-4 to 1-2 of an inch in diameter. The tree is in proper condition for spring budding as soon as the buds have started growth and the bark slips readily.

Summer budding is performed only after the new buds and branches have become well developed. Only those buds near the base of the shoot, which have formed in the early part of the season, and which are more fully matured, are used.

For spring work buds which have formed the preceding summer, and for fall work buds which have formed earlier in the same growing season should be used. They will also grow best when placed upon the corresponding season's growth, although they may be placed upon older wood. If an old tree is to be budded it should be heavily pruned in the winter. The following spring a number of new growths will start from the trunk and branches. Of these the desirable ones can be budded that fall, or can with most be left until the following spring. Spring budding can be practiced on the apple, and trees of similar character, which do not bear fruit buds on the current season's growth; that is, fruit buds form in the fall on the wood which formed in the summer months. For this reason budding on fruits of this character is always better in the fall.

A sharp, thin-bladed knife of good metal should be used. Special knives with a curved cutting edge at the end can be obtained from the seedman or supply houses. In seedlings the bud should be placed about six inches from the surface to remove it somewhat from the excessive heat near the surface caused by the reflection of the sun's rays. It is often set on the north side of the tree, as this side is least exposed to the sunlight and drying. The wound to receive the bud is made by two incisions in the form of a T. The first cut is made with the grain of the wood, about one and a half inches in length. The second is made across the grain of the wood, at the top of the first one, with a rocking motion of the knife. The corners of the bark are then loosened with the blade of the knife and the stock is ready for the bud. The bud is cut from a twig with a shield shaped piece of bark about an inch in length and one-quarter of an inch in width. Hold the twig with the base from you, and, starting about half an inch below the bud, cut toward you. The cut will be from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of an inch at its deepest point, which is directly beneath the bud. A portion of the wood is removed with the bud. Now insert the bud, pushing it well down into the cut. No portion of the piece to which the bud is attached should be left projecting beyond the cleft, and the lips of the bark should be fitted snugly around the bud itself. Buds always occur just above a leaf. If, however, the leaf is cut off with the knife, leaving a portion of the leaf stalk, the stub will serve as a handle to the bud and aid materially in placing [illegible] may not grow if not placed correctly.

The bud should not be wrapped firmly in place. No wax is needed. A piece of raffia about twelve inches in length is the best material for wrapping. This protects the bud as well as holds it firmly in place. Do not wrap over the bud itself, but above and below it. If raffia is not available, any soft cord or cloth may be used. In from two to three weeks the bud should have united and the tying material should then be removed, as if left longer it will constrict the stem and perhaps strangle the bud. If the operation has been successful the branch should be cut off one-half inch or so above the bud to force the growth of the bud.

On large trees budding is seldom practised for commercial purposes. Such short-lived and early-bearing trees as the peach are generally replaced if undesirable. Trees on which top-working is advantageous are as a rule grafted instead of budded.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

The Wisconsin Station has made interesting tests to prove relative sizes and weights of litters from young and old sows, with astonishing results. In these tests sows weighing on an average of 482 pounds at farrowing time produced an average of 9.2 pigs per litter, with a weight per litter of 27 pounds. From sows weighing 307 pounds the average number in the litter was 5.5 pigs and the average weight of a litter 14 pounds. Sows between the ages of four and five years averaged nine pigs to a litter and a weight per litter of 26 pounds; sows between two and three years old had an average 10.7 pounds in weight, and sows a year old produced litters of 7.4 pigs, with an average weight of 11.2 per litter.

One of the most useful drugs for any stable is alum. It can be dissolved in water and used as a wash for saddle galls and abrasions of the skin, and weak solutions of it are useful, as washes for the mouth or vagina.

The following sprays are recommended for destroying garden pests:

Squash Beetle—Spray with paris green.

Tomato Worm—Hand pick with gloves or spray with paris green.

Potato Beetle—Spray with paris green and lime, or brush off in a shallow pan and destroy.

Cut Worms—Mix paris green and bran and spread as a bait before plants are set. Put paper collars around young plants.

Striped Cucumber Beetle — Cover plants with cheesecloth screens, spray with arsenate of lead, five pounds to 50 gallons of water.

Army Worms—Spray with paris green, spread bran and paris green bait or plow a deep ditch with a steep side next to crop and kill them in the trench.

Take good care of the work horses, now that the time is at hand when the farm stock, and especially the horses, suffer greatly from heat and thirst. Give them water and rest at proper intervals not too far apart. See that the harness is fitted well to the animal wearing it. Failure to take thought for the comfort of a horse may result in its being permanently disabled in one way or another, as experience has shown.

Such vegetables as cabbage, cauliflower and onions utilize to the best advantage heavy applications of manure.

A Joint Concern.

When Richard Brinsley Sheridan was in distress, in early life, one of his resources was that of writing for the fugitive publications of the day, in which he was materially assisted by his wife, and many years after his entrance into the spheres of politics he was heard to say that "If he had stuck to the law he believed he should have done as much as his friend Tom Erskine; but," continued he, "I had no time for such studies. Mrs. Sheridan and myself were often obliged to keep writing for our daily leg or shoulder of mutton; otherwise we should have had no dinner." One of his friends, to whom he confessed this, wittily replied: "Then I perceive it was a 'joint' concern."

OUR PULPWOOD

Consumption Has Increased 10 Per Cent., Despite War.

Some economists have termed this the "paper age" from the increasing use of paper in all walks of life. This being the case it is gratifying to know that Canada is one of the great paper countries of the world and is destined to become still greater in this respect. All interested in paper and the materials from which it is produced (pulp and pulpwood), look forward to the issue of the annual bulletin on "Pulpwood" by the Forestry Branch of the Department of the Interior. This has now been sent to the printer and a few of the leading facts from it may be given. In spite of the war the consumption of pulpwood in Canadian mills was over 10 per cent. greater in 1914 than in 1913.

Since 1910 the pulpwood consumed in Canadian mills has a little more than doubled. The consumption in 1910 was 598,487 cords and in 1914, 1,224,376 cords. The commonest and cheapest kind of pulp, made by the grinding process and known as ground-wood pulp, increased by 9 per cent. over 1913, but that made by chemical processes increased by over 14 per cent. This increasing use of chemical processes helps the country greatly as the product is worth nearly three times as much as the ground-wood pulp.

Quebec is still the leading Province in pulp production, having 31 active mills out of a total of 66 mills for all Canada. Quebec produced 56 per cent. of all Canadian pulp in 1914, Ontario came second with nearly 37 per cent. of the total production, and the other producing provinces in order were British Columbia, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The total value of pulpwood consumed in Canadian mills in 1914 was $8,089,868 and of that exported to foreign countries in a raw state $6,680,490 making a grand total of $14,770,358 for the value of the pulpwood produced last year. It is interesting to note that the proportion of pulpwood manufactured into pulp in Canada is increasing over that exported in the raw state. The bulletin containing all the facts of this industry will be issued in a few weeks and those desiring a copy or requiring immediate information on some particular point may have the same furnished free by writing the Director of Forestry, Department of the Interior, Ottawa.

THE C. P. R. AND RUSSIA

The traffic arrangement by which the C. P. R. will represent the Russian Government in providing for through freight services from the Dominion to Russia by the Trans-Siberian Railway and the Russian Volunteer Fleet, which is an auxiliary of the railway, is an amplification of the connection which the company has sustained with the Trans-Siberian Railway, which is a state-owned system. The Company has offices in Moscow and Petrograd in which it does business, the only railway on this continent to have such offices in Russia. If it would seem strange that the Company should do business in either city, it need only be mentioned that the C. P. R. is the only railway in America which is a member of the Round the World Conference of which the executive of the Trans-Siberian Railway line, which the average Russian always calls the "Transcontinental" line—this being the notion the system conveys to his mind. On this line there are three types of engine. The wood engine is a special type, which is not built at all on this continent, but it serves the purpose in the physical circumstances on the system, which is differentiated in several ways from those on this continent.

HER SHOES.

What the Woman Who is Well Dressed Will Not Do.

The woman who is really well dressed does not wear a smart frock and a becoming hat and then ruin her whole appearance by clothing her feet in a pair of shoddy shoes, run down at the heel and perhaps unpolished. And yet many women who are fastidious as to their appearance, who would not think of going out of the house without their suits being well pressed, their blouses being fresh and dainty, their veils adjusted in just the right way, will forget entirely to look at the condition of their shoes. Perhaps these will be worn and dusty and will be made still uglier by being worn with a pair of soiled and crumpled spats.

There is nothing prettier than well shod feet, nothing uglier than a pair of neglected, run down, soiled shoes. And now that abbreviated skirts are fashionable, the girl who wants to be well dressed will take great pains in selecting her shoes, and once she has purchased an appropriate and pretty pair she will take still greater pains to keep them in good condition.

Never take off a pair of shoes without putting a pair of trees in them immediately. This will help them to keep their shape and also will help to prolong the life of the boots. When there is the least suspicion of the heels becoming run down send them to the bootmaker's immediately and have them straightened. Nothing looks so shabby as a pair of crooked heels.

Now as to some of the novelties to be seen this spring. In the first place the light top boot, which has made such a favorable impression this winter, remains in vogue for spring, all the smartest shoes having either light tan or light gray uppers. Gun metal leather and dark gray tops are also considered smart, while a tan shod with a tan upper is very chic.

Fires in the Philippines.

The fighting of fires in the dry season is a grave problem in the cities and pueblos of the Philippine Islands. House construction is light, the roofs being made from nipa palm leaves, the framework of bamboo and the sides of either nipa or sawali—a woven product of certain species of bamboo. When this material has been exposed continuously to the sun for several months it becomes as inflammable as tinder. Fires that break out in the nipa districts always gain great headway before any kind of an alarm can be sent in even where there is a fire department. Fires in such districts spread with great rapidity. In thickly populated areas it is not uncommon for a fire to burn several hundred houses before it is stopped.

GERMAN GLEE OVER GASES

Ghoulish Delight of Officer at Success of Brutal Scheme.

Those Not Dead From Results Quickly Bayoneted.

An English paper just to hand has the following regarding the German delight over the effects of their gas warfare:

Liege, June 19.—Received via Rotterdam, Monday)—I have had an instructive conversation here with a German soldier, who has returned from the Ypres front for a few days' rest. This man took part in the attacks made with the help of poisonous gases, and he told me several details concerning this new method of warfare.

"We lay in our positions for months," he said, "and could never push forward a hundred metres. The British machine guns were handled too well. We could not approach the enemy's lines. Then, on the first day the gases were used we gained two kilometres. This was the result of the gas. You should have seen how it worked. It was fine." My pleasant acquaintance smiled a broad smile. "Everywhere the bodies of asphyxiated soldiers. There was white foam on their mouths, and their faces were black. Those who were still able to resist were soon stuck by the bayonet. It was a ghastly sight, but it was the greatest victory our company has had in the whole war."

I asked him whether the gas was liberated from bombs. "No," he replied. "It is put up in cylinders, just like carbonic acid gas or oxygen. The cylinders—we call them bottles—were buried in front of our trenches, with only the outlet tap left above the ground. When the wind was favorable the taps were opened, and thick dark clouds rolled towards the trenches of the enemy. Then we received the order for the storm attack, and rushed for the enemy's lines. Of course we cannot use the gas always, because when the wind is not blowing direct towards the opposite trenches we stand a chance of getting some of it ourselves, and that would be less pleasant.

"We had some experience of this kind of thing the other day, when a British shell struck some of our concealed gas bottles, and they exploded. The gases came into our own trenches, and before safety measures could be taken, fifty of our men lay dead on the spot.

"Will you go on using them?" I asked. "I hardly think so," replied the soldier. "The last time we used them and ran up to the enemy trenches, instead of finding them emptied, as we had anticipated, we were received with a terrible machine gun fire and a rifle salvo, and we had to hurry back to our own lines. Apparently the men had respirators on and the gas did not seem to have effected them. So if this goes on the gases will be useless to us unless, of course, we find something else, for German science shrinks from no problem, however difficult it is."

In reply to my definite question what the Germans thought of the employment of gases he answered, "They are a splendid weapon. For what is the aim of all arms? To make the enemy unfit to fight. This the gas accomplished in the highest degree. It may be that it is a cruel weapon, but the whole war is cruel, and was it not the Englishmen who used it first?" Your correspondent, being a neutral, offered no reply to this last question.—Central News.

EAR DRUMS AND DROWNING.

Why Good Swimmers May Meet Sudden Death in the Water.

Sudden death of swimmers has never been explained satisfactorily, but it is generally assumed that it is due to cramps that affect the respiratory muscles. The Medical Record says there is another theory that "has never received the attention which it merits. This is that cold water penetrating the ear sets up an irritation in the delicate passages of the inner ear. It cites an address delivered by Dr. Guettich before the Berlin Otological Society, in which he revived this theory.

The irritation of the labyrinth of the inner ear by cold water might cause sudden paralysis, just as a shock to it through a sharp blow on the chin will cause a "knockout." The symptoms of the swimmer and the fighter are similar. They can make motions, but cannot direct them; they may become temporarily unconscious. In the case of the swimmer, of course, drowning follows unless some one helps him.

The Med. Record says that persons with perforated ear drums are those chiefly menaced by this accident, although it may occur to others. And this in spite of the fact that children with large perforations of the ear drum often swim and dive with impunity.

A FRUIT CHANCE

War Furnishes Markets to Canadian Growers.

As showing to some extent how much good fruit-growing means to Canada, it is worth noting the amount of trade formerly done by the countries at war that lies open for cultivation by this country. At the Canadian Fruit Growers' Conference held at Grimsby last September Mr. J. A. Ruddick, Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner, stated that he had staken a period of five years, and that he had found the importations of apples from Germany to Britain varied each year from 5,000 to 14,000 bushel boxes, from Belgium from 100,000 to 500,000 boxes, from France from 60,000 to 575,000 boxes, and from Portugal from 175,000 to 250,000 boxes. Of pears the importations varied from 4,450 to 80,000 bushel boxes from Germany, from 262,800 to 504,480 boxes from Belgium, and from 422,440 to 506,160 boxes from Portugal. Large quantities were also imported from the Netherlands, which may not be available. Mr. Ruddick prognosticated an increased demand for dried and evaporated fruit from Great Britain for use in the army. In 1913 Canada exported of this line to the United Kingdom 121,188 pounds, to Newfoundland 10,583 pounds, and to Germany 247,503 pounds. Of course the trade with Germany will be cut off, but the exportations should expand in other directions.

THE ADOPTED HOME BOY.

There are thousands of adopted children in Canada. The rural districts are full of them. J. J. Kelso, Superintendent of Neglected and Dependent Children of Ontario, has issued a leaflet in reference to these children: "What is the legal status of the adopted child?" "Can she take our name?" "Can this boy inherit the farm?" are questions often asked by foster parents, he says. Foster parents can change the name of an adopted child to their own without any special authority, and it is quite legal for the child later on to do business under the new name and also to marry. The chief difficulty is over inheritance. If there is no will then the adopted child is cut off entirely from participation in the estate of the foster parents. It is absolutely essential that a will should be made and the words inserted, "I give and bequeath to my adopted daughter —— the sum of——," or describing the property or article. This should be attended to while the foster parent is in good health and not left until death threatens.

IN FLYING CORPS

G.T.R. Apprentice With the British in France.

Among the twelve hundred Grand Trunk men who have enlisted for overseas service are several apprentices from the motive power department of the railway. These young men are variously employed, many of them in the firing line, with the Canadian Expeditionary force, while others have turned their technical skill to advantage in the other branches of the service.

Among those who enlisted from the Grand Trunk shops at Battle Creek, Mich., on the outbreak of the war was an English apprentice, A. J. Locke, and the Master Mechanic at Battle Creek has just received the following letter from the young man's mother who resides at Godalming, Surrey:

"I am writing to thank you very much of the gift of money sent through you to my son, A. J. Locke, and to thank you also for your kindness to and interest in him while he was employed in the G. T. R. shops. I can assure you that both my husband and myself will ever feel grateful to you for the welcome you extended to him amongst you, and for the very thorough tuition which he must have had while with you, though, for a short time (these unforeseen circumstances interrupting his apprenticeship) which has enabled him to go out and do his duty for King and country. He is working as a fitter (first-class air mechanic) in the airship factories of the Royal Flying Corps, somewhere in France, and I am glad to tell you that he is keeping well, working very hard, long hours, too, cheerfully, loyally doing his share, amidst many dangers, to keep these wild barbarians away from our homes, and it is just what I would have him do. He is my one boy, and I wish I had others who could help in this awful struggle, for such it is, and will be until we finally crush these monsters forever, which, by God's help, we shall do, at a terrible cost, we know, and great sacrifices."

ENGLAND AS AN ISLAND.

Changes a Channel Tunnel and Perfect Aviation Would Bring.

Great Britain is an island. Unless there is some great convulsion of nature to all time the Strait of Dover will separate it from the continent of Europe. Yet every now and then a renewal of the scheme for a channel tunnel is heard, and at this moment men are flying from England to France and France to England.

Suppose the channel tunnel to be made; suppose flying to be improved—and it is improving every day—what will become of the island? What will become of the sea? They will be there and will be shown on the map, but to all human intents and purposes the geography will be changed. The sea will no longer be a barrier; it will no longer be the only highroad from England to France. There will be going to and from on or in dry land and going to and fro neither on land nor sea. Suppose this science of aviation to make great strides and heavy loads to be carried in the air, what will become of the ports, and what will become of the seagoing peoples?

The ports will be there, appearing as now on the map, but Birmingham goods will be shipped at Birmingham for foreign parts and Lithgow will export mineral direct, saying goodby to the Blue Mountain and even to Sydney harbor.—Sir Charles P. Lucas in Science.

THE POULTRY WORLD

MASHES FOR THE CHICKS.

Chicks grow rapidly when fed on moist mashes, but the digestive system does not develop proportionately and with too much soft food they often break down. The tendency of poultry keepers generally is to take one or other extreme in cases like this, and because of that many who find certain unfavorable results with the use of moist mash do away with it entirely, either substituting dry mash or using no ground grain, says Farm-Poultry. When this is done, special attention should be given to providing succulent food.

The best feeding practice is to alternate mash and grain, and it is a good plan even when a moist mash is used to have a little dry mash where chicks can get it when they want it. They will eat more when the food provided them is in a variety of forms, and the more you can get them to eat of suitable rations, the better they will grow. Up to the limit of its capacity the digestive power increases with use and suitable food. One of the best ways to feed eggs to chicks is to take raw infertile eggs and mix up, shell and all, with as much cornmeal or cornmeal and shorts as can be mixed with the egg with a stiff spoon. Don't feed this heartily, but give what they will clean up quick once a day. Stale bread, soaked in warm water, just enough to saturate it, and then stirred thick with cornmeal and a little fine beef scrap, is another mash much relished by chicks.

Such things can be prepared in a moment. No one need worry about such irregular dishes disturbing the "balance" of the ration. They give the variety that is acceptable to all creatures. It is a hard matter to seriously "unbalance" a ration by the use of any occasional meal, even of an article far from the general ratio, and the articles mentioned and others that people may prepare from waste foods they happen to have are not very far from the common ratio.

FEED CHICKS LIGHTLY.

Many chicks die from being overfed. The little chick is a fairly hardy creature when normally healthy, but if it is not fed carefully its digestive system is upset readily and death often results. Do not feed the chick until it is thirty-six hours old, for it cannot digest the grain which you give it in addition to the yolk sac which is usually not completely absorbed at the time of hatching. A good practice is to feed a little at a time, but feed frequently. The more often chicks are fed each day the less danger there is of overfeeding. When the chicks are quite young they should be fed five times every day. When they get to be about six weeks old then they could be fed three or four times every day. Wet, sloppy food should be avoided always. Give the chicks dry cracked grain or dry mashes. The mashes, which are usually made of wheat, bran, cornmeal, crushed oats, middlings and beef scraps, are mixed thoroughly and moistened with water, or better still, with sour skim milk. If this mixture is dry fed it is given in self-feeding hoppers. If fed wet it is given in troughs. See that it is just slightly moistened, as foods which are too wet do not agree with chicks.

Do not feed too much hard boiled eggs at the start, as the chicks cannot digest it readily.

If you have sour skim milk available give it to the chicks all of the time, as it is one of the best chick feeds.

Feed in such a way that the chicks will take plenty of exercise all of the time, as it is one of our best chick feeds. Feed often, and feed other feeds.—M. A. Jull, in Prairie, Farm and Home.

SEPARATE THE SEXES.

Cockerels and pullets should be separated as soon as they can be distinguished, which in most cases will be when the chicks are five to eight weeks old. Keep the young males yarded together, so that they may be speedily fattened for market, but give the pullets as much range as possible. This will give them the constitutional vigor necessary for heavy egg production next fall and winter. Males which it is desired to keep for breeding purposes may be separated from the others a little later, when their characteristics and quality may be better judged.

POULTRY TALK.

A wild hen in a flock is always a disturbing element.

A turkey hen desires to be let severely alone during the laying season; she is very apt to change her nest when being watched.

For each day there is some timely work in the poultry yard, which will give better returns than at any other time.

Look on the underside of the perches where they rest upon the supports, for the red mites, the parasites to be most feared by the poultry raiser. Get after these torments with a spray pump and some good lice-killer, for the sake of profit if not for humane reasons.

When the mother hens and their chicks must be shut up on a cool damp day, give them chaff from the barn floor to scratch in. The small timothy seed they get out of the chaff seems to agree with them; they don't need much other food.

The chicks that live are the chicks that pay, the eternal vigilance is required to keep many of them living. Be on the watch. Many a chick is caught in a storm at this season, and chilled to death.

Always remember that a warm sunny morning is the best time to apply the grease remedy to a lot of lousy chicks. It is bad for the chicks to grease them when it is cold and wet. But if too liberal with grease at any time, you will kill the chicks as well as the lice.

Household Hints.

To prevent glass dishes from cracking when pouring in a hot mixture place the dish on a hot cloth.

A few drops of ammonia in the dish water will brighten the glass and silver.

Suet may be kept fresh by chopping roughly and sprinkling it with a little granulated sugar.

To prevent a tam-o'-shanter that has to be washed from shrinking, dry it over a dinner plate.

To restore faded silks of their natural color, immerse them in a vessel to which a little pearl ash has been added.

The Cargill Bowling Club are arranging to hold a tournament some time in August.

Three rinks of Hanover bowlers are expected to play here tomorrow night (Friday.)

Fordyce—Overand

A quiet and very pretty wedding took place in the Methodist Parsonage Cargill on Wednesday June 30th, when Wesley Overand of Eden Grove and Miss Mary Maria Fordyce also of Eden Grove and later teacher at Tottenham were united in the bonds of holy matrimony by Rev. W. J. Fiddis Ph. B. The grooms' gift to the bride was a gold brooch set with pearls, while the brides' present to the groom was a gold watch fob with the signets of the lodges of which he was a member. On the Monday evening following the wedding a large company of friends gathered at the home of the young couple and showered them with a goodly supply of kitchen utensils as a mark of their mutual goodwill and esteem. After the presentation of the gifts a very pleasant and sociable evening was spent in games and chat and before leaving a splendid supper was served to the guests. The good will of the community goes with the young couple as they start out on their journey through life together.

Patriotic Dance
Owing to the success of the last Patriotic dance the ladies have been asked to get up another which will be held in the Town Hall this coming Friday, July 23rd, at 8 o'clock sharp. Ladies are requested to bring cake or sandwiches. Gentlemen $1.00 admission.

Soldier Breaks Arm
Private Frank Zettel who is with the 34th battalion at London had the misfortune to have his arm broken one day last week. Zettel who is the groom of Col. Douglas' charger was in the stable exercising the animal when it became fractious and he was thrown to the ground with the above result.

Contributions for Soldiers Comforts.
Mrs. E. J. Skelton treasurer of the local branch of the I.O.D.E. thankfully acknowledges these donations—$10.50, proceeds of the Reithdorf lecture at Cargill; $29.50 from the Brant Ladies Hospital Aid; $33.00 from the Walkerton branch of the Women's Institute and $53.10 from the patriotic dance. These monies will be used in purchasing soldiers comforts.

Patriotic Picnic
Grand Patriotic picnic to be held on the exhibition grounds, Aug. 2nd. Baseball, races, speeches. Band in attendance.

Soldier's Aid Bazaar.
The Ladies of the Soldier's Aid are arranging to hold a bazaar about October 1st. and the ladies of Walkerton and vicinity are requested to prepare donations for the baby booth, apron and towel booth, tea booth, fancy work booth, and the fishpond. There will also be candy and home-made baking booths contributions for which will also be asked for.

Complained about Hens
A lady of the west ward complained to the police this week that her neighbours hens despite her remonstrances were allowed to run at large and continued to do irreparable damage to her garden. Chief Ferguson investigated and ordered the neighbor in question to keep her fowl in the pen and if this is not done proceedings will probably be instituted against her.

Some Excellent Fish.
Some excellent specimens of the finny tribe are being landed from the Saugeen in the vicinity of the Truax dam. Fred Brislan has recently hooked a large number of black bass, the largest of which tipped the scales at 2lb 10oz. and the next 2½lbs, while on Monday Vic Eidt caught a rainbow trout which measured 15 inches and weighed 1½ pounds.

Local Youth Enlists.
Another local young man has enlisted for overseas service in the person of Walter Bryce who has been a member of the Tobermory Wireless guard for some months. Pte. Bryce is expected to visit at his home here this week, prior to leaving for London. His place on the wireless guard will be taken by his brother Charlie, who failed to pass the medical examination for overseas service.

Not Yet in France
A report which was circulated and published some time ago stating that the second Canadian Contingent had gone to France, was apparently untrue as the local boys who went with that contingent are still on English soil. A letter was received from Private Norm Hock on Tuesday stating that they expected to leave for the front early in August, but what part of the battle line they would be sent to, he was unable to say. All the local boys are in good health.

No Drowning Accident.
The excitement which was aroused by finding of a man's clothes on the bank of the Saugeen at the boat houses on Tuesday of last week has subsided and the mystery remains unsolved. There was, apparently however, no cause for excitement for the authorities are now satisfied that there was no drowning accident, and they are now convinced that the clothes were discarded by some tramp for a newer outfit.

Won the District.
The Walkerton junior lacrosse team played the final O.A.L.A. game of the schedule for this district in Hanover on Tuesday evening and after one hour's play, which at times was somewhat rough, emerged with a victory to their credit, the score being 7-6. The half time score was 5-4 in favor of Hanover. By winning this game the local boys have carried off the district honors and now enter the semi-finals. The team which they will probably be drawn against is Fergus.

Mr. A. Hohn desires to express his sincere thanks to his friends and neighbors for the many kindnesses shown him during his recent bereavement, caused by the sudden death of his wife who passed away on Tuesday July 6th.

Operated On
Mrs. Everett Truax was taken to the hospital on Thursday last where she underwent an operation for appendicitis. Her condition for a time was serious, but she is now on the road to recovery

Died in New Westminster
On receiving word last week that his brother Robert was very low at his home in New Westminster, B.C. Mr. D. Robertson left on Wednesday for the western city, in hopes of seeing his brother before he died, but on reaching Kenora, he received a telegram stating that he had passed away. Mr. Robertson proceeded on his journey and attended the funeral which took place in New Westminster. The wife of the late Mr. Robertson who was 35 years of age predeceased him by only a few days.

Theatre Changes Hands.
The Red Star Theatre has once more changed hands, the new proprietor being Mr. L. Plisson of Toronto. Mr. Plisson, who took possession of the theatre today, intends moving it to the vacant stand in the Kilmer block, east of the city bakery. In the near future, as the building at present occupied by the theatre has been leased to Mr. Chas. Petteplace, who purposes opening a boot and shoe store there. Mr. Dave Karges, the former proprietor of the Red Star, is returning to the baking business, having purchased a business in Haileybury and will move to that town in the near future.

As Others See Us
"In Walkerton citizens are being "pulled" for looking cross-ways. The magistrates and constables should make a strong tug-of-war team, as they are "pulling" six days in the week and are finding considerable easy money.

The above from the Ripley Express is the opinion of citizens of the neighboring towns and villages as to the work of the Walkerton police court authorities. We admit that in some cases the authorities are somewhat over-zealous in making prosecutions, but what citizens of Walkerton want is a clean town free from rowdyism of every nature and the one and only way to secure this is to enforce the law to the letter, which the police are doing to the best of their ability. The only objection made locally is that in some cases fines and at times heavy ones are imposed, when a suspended sentence would meet with more public approval.

Gasoline Took Fire
A London motorist came within an ace of starting a serious fire at Vogan's hardware late Saturday night. While being served with gasoline he foolishly struck a match, a spark from which ignited the liquid and in a twinkling the front part of his car was enveloped in flames and the fire was rapidly going along the rubber hose to the tank. With rare presence of mind, Sam Vogan who was selling the gasoline, grasped the burning hose and with a jerk pulled them apart at a coupling two feet from the pump of the tank just before the flames reached the coupling and threw them in to the street and thus prevented the building taken fire. Why the flames did not reach the tank of the car is a mystery, but as it was the fire was extinguished and no damage, beyond a scorched tire was done to the machine. We dislike to surmise what would have been the result of the motorists' foolhardy act had the tank on his machine exploded or had the flames reached Vogan's oil house, which would have happened but for Sam's presence of mind and timely act. The Londoner considered himself fortunate on coming through the experience with the small cost of new line of hose which were badly burned in several places before the fire in them was extinguished.

No Game at Teeswater.
The Walkerton baseball team went to Teeswater on Friday last accompanied by a large crowd of rooters to play the final game in the schedule of this district of the Northern League. The team as well as the fans, however, were doomed to disappointment for no game was played, the reason for this being a squabble with regards to the umpire. It appears that when here for the last game the two teams agreed upon a certain umpire to officiate at final game, but when Friday's game was about to commenced, the Teeswater club placed a former Teeswaterite behind the plate. As the locals were afraid of getting a raw deal from a stranger they refused to consent to this. The home team however, insisted on having the umpire of their choice while the Walkertonians were as determined they should not. Thinking to affect a compromise the locals offered to play half the game under the Teeswater man if the umpire at first chosen was allowed to officiate for the balance of the game. The home team, however, would not agree to this and after a great deal of squabbling the Walkerton team left the field the spectators being refunded their money. The circumstances of the controversy have been sent to the officials of the N.B.L., but as yet, no word as to their decision in regard to the matter has been received.

Wake up, your King and country need you! This poster was placed on a cemetery fence in England and might be termed a stiff proposition.

Had Tumor Removed.
Mrs. M. Porteous underwent an operation at her home on Tuesday morning for the removal of a tumor which had grown beneath her shoulder blade. The operation which was performed by Dr. H. H. Sinclair, is reported to have been successful and the patient is now on the mend.

Convent Pupils all Successful
In last week's paper, we mentioned the fact that all the candidates of the Walkerton Public School had been successful in passing the Entrance Examination. This can also be said of the Walkerton convent and great credit is also due the Sisters of Notre Dame for the excellent showing of the Entrance candidates from the Convent.

Monster Farmer's Picnic
A picnic under the auspices of the "United Farmers of Ontario" will be given in Mr. C. J. Leifso's grove, near Malcolm on Tuesday July 27th. E.C. Drury of Crown Hill, and J. J. Morrison, sec of the Association are expected to be present. A good program of sports is being arranged. Baseball and foot-ball matches between local teams. Rain or shine. Hay or no hay. Drop everything and come and spend a pleasant afternoon. Alex Rae, vice Pres. H. W. Monk, Pres.

Moffat—Jones
At the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. Jones, Dungannon, Ont. was solemnized the marriage of their daughter, Mary Olive (May) to Wm J. Moffat of Edmonton Alta., on Wednesday, July 14th at 10.30 a.m. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. McKelvy in the presence of immediate relatives and friends. The bride, unattended, was attired in a gown of white charmeuse and wore a bridal veil caught up by a wreath of orange blossoms. After luncheon the bride and groom left for a short trip to Toronto and Niagara Falls before departing for the west. The bride's travelling suit was navy blue serge with hat of white milan. The groom's gift to the bride was a necklace of whole pearls. The presents were numerous and costly, showing the esteem in which they are held. The best wishes of the friends are extended to Mr. and Mrs. Moffatt in their future career.

No More Free Advertising.
The one business man in any town who is continually solicited to make contributions to patriotic, Red Cross, church and hospital work, is the newspaperman. Although we have always had a special low rate for advertising patriotic or Red Cross entertainments, etc., those who are endeavoring to raise money for these great causes are not satisfied with this and have asked that all ads be inserted free of charge as our contribution to the work. In many cases this we consented to do, and as an example, this week there are no less than three locals, advertising money-making schemes which we are inserting gratis. On consideration, however, owing to the advanced cost of paper, printer's ink, and also the high cost of living we must call a halt to this practice and in future all locals advertising money-making schemes will be charged for at the former rate. The merchant is not asked to give his goods away gratis, therefore why should the printer? We might add that we are glad at any time to insert reports of meetings etc., or make a note of the work that is being done by any of the societies. Any contributions which we see fit to make will in future be in cash

Arrived in England
The Telescope on Saturday received a letter from Private Robert Turner who left London, Ont recently for England, and is now at Shorncliffe, Camp. Pte. Turner's letter in part says:

We arrived safely in England at Plymouth with the 34th battalion reinforcement company from London landing at 1 o'clock on Monday, June 28th. The liner Armenian was torpedoed by a German submarine about the same time as we reached port, so we had a close shave, although we were escorted by two British destroyers. England is quite a different country from Canada but we like it so far.

The 34th reinforcement company is now attached to the 11th reserve battallion. This battallion is used as a reserve base for the Princess Pats, so when we go to the front, we will go to reinforce the Pats.

The accomodations here are very good. We are housed in small barracks 25 men and a N.C.O. to each one. These barracks are called huts here and they are well lighted and very comfortable. The Walkerton boys belonging to the 18th Bat. are still here, also Jim Leach who belongs to the 10th Battery. Last night coming into camp, I met Lieut. McNally and was very glad to see him. He is well and expects to go back to the front soon. I have also met Art Taggart another Walkerton boy. He is a Lance Corporal in the 19th Battalion A. M. C.

A GIFT OF A SOUL

Each day Davidoff, pursuing the same course, gave Juliette an account of the results of the investigations he told her he was making. And each day he saw this benumbed and frozen heart slowly reawakening to life. It was a delightful spectacle to the doctor to see it timidly putting forth new buds. Juliette hoped, but with fear and trembling, and at times she would stop short suddenly on the road whither her imagination would lead her. What if, after indulging in these dreams, she should have to fall back again into her former state of despair? What if the reports they had heard should prove untrue, and Pierre had not been rescued?

Her heart was tortured by these conflicting hopes and fears. It seemed to her impossible that death should have snatched away in an instant this young man so full of life and vigor. She recalled to mind what her brother had said to her at Beaulieu: "His body has not been recovered." She had not at the time accepted these words as a ground for hope. But now was it not evident that if the sea had not cast his body back upon the shore it was because he had been saved from its treacherous waves, and that he still lived? The hope was now so deeply rooted in her heart that to tear it thence nothing less than positive proof would have sufficed. For her who loved him, it would be necessary to see Pierre dead in order to believe that he no longer lived.

This very morning Davidoff had ventured to say to Juliette:

"I dined yesterday with some people who met our friend in Italy and spoke to him. We may expect to see him make his appearance one of these days."

She looked fixedly at the doctor for a few moments, and then said:

"Why do you not tell me everything? Are you afraid of the effect my joy would have upon me? You are wrong. I am certain now that he lives. I saw him last night in my dreams. He was in a church, a poor village church, and he was painting a sacred picture. His face was sad—sad, and from time to time a tear rolled down his cheek. I had a conviction that he was thinking of me. I wished to cry out, 'Pierre, enough of sorrow, enough of separation. Come back; we are waiting for you, and it would make us so happy to welcome you.' But a sort of mist arose between us, and I could only see him faintly, in vague outline, and I could hear distinctly the noise of the waves, like the surf beating against the rocks at Beaulieu. Then this mist disappeared, like a veil which is torn away, and I saw him once more clearly. He came toward me, a smile upon his lips. He made a gesture as if to say, 'Have patience; I am coming,' and then I awoke, trembling and exhausted. But I have faith. He is near us—in Paris, perhaps?"

"Can you describe to me the church of which you speak?" asked Davidoff, greatly surprised.

"Yes," returned Juliette. "It stood facing a square of a village. The gateway to it was of red standstone, surmounted by a sloping roof of brick. The walls were whitewashed and everything in it was of the humblest description—a few wooden benches, a plain chair, and a very simple altar."

"And the picture Pierre was painting" asked the doctor, "did you see it? Can you remember what it was like?"

"Yes, there was an open grave in it—from which a dead man was rising. I saw in this an omen."

Davidoff shook his head in silence, greatly impressed by this extraordinary revelation. It was evidently he who, by the power of thought, had made Mlle. de Vignes see the church at Torrevecchio, and the picture of the Resurrection; but the noise of the waves striking the ear of the young girl, at the very hour in which Pierre was on the sea, how explain this?

He remained silent, and despite all Juliette could do gave her no further information. But his attitude, his words, all had announced a coming event. The doctor left the young girl in a state of agitation which he thought favorable to his plans, and took his departure. In the evening when he stopped before Mme. de Vignes's door, accompanied by the man whose presence was so ardently desired, his heart beat violently. He pressed his friend's arm with force, and pointed to the last window of the entresol he said:

"Remain here and keep your eyes fixed on that window. When you see me appear at it, come in, but not before. I am going to prepare the way for you. I am more uneasy than I can tell you."

He entered the house, leaving the painter on the sidewalk below. Laurier, left thus alone, was seized by an emotion similar to that which he had experienced standing on the rocky point at Torrevecchio, the sea rolling at his feet, when, after receiving Davidoff's letter, he had questioned his own heart to know if he were worthy of Juliette. A solemn emotion took possession of him while he thus waited the moment to present himself to the young girl. He was grave and thoughtful with the sense that he was making an act of reparation. He had none of the impatience, the joyful peace of a convert who is about to abjure his errors, obtain pardon for his sins, and live henceforward in peace with God and man.

He stood leaning against the wall, his eyes fixed on the window, thinking of the scene that was taking place in the darkened apartment within. There was no sign of life, everything was silent. A great calm absorbed every other within him—his love for Juliette. He recalled to mind the timid and innocent love of the young girl, he remembered the sorrows he had made her suffer, and face to face with himself in the silence of the night, he swore to make her forget them.

At this moment the window was faintly illuminated, and Dr. Davidoff gave the signal for his friend to enter.

Laurier hurried forward and with beating heart mounted the steps. The door was open, he crossed the hall, entered the drawing-room, and standing by his mother's side in front of the chimney-piece he saw Juliette. He paused motionless, his limbs trembling, gazing at her with an unsteady glance.

She seemed to him taller than before, perhaps because she had grown thinner and had lost her color. Her white hands showed delicate and transparent against her black robe. Her eyes, filled with tears, shone with a soft brightness. She smiled, and examined Pierre as Pierre was examining her. She thought he had grown handsomer, with his sunburned face framed by the brown beard he had allowed to grow. She read on his brow traces of what he had suffered, and this compensated her for something of her own suffering. Her smile ended in tears, and putting her handkerchief to her eyes she sank into an arm-chair and burst into tears.

Pierre uttered a cry, and rushing toward her threw himself at her feet entreating her forgiveness. Mme. de Vignes in much alarm hastened to her side, but Davidoff reassured her with a glance. Then the mother and the physician, seeing that the two young people had forgotten everything but themselves, left them to enjoy in freedom the first moments of their happiness.

When they returned they found Pierre and the young girl seated beside each other, her hand clasped in his. Juliette was telling him of her past sorrows. She smiled at the recollection of them now, but Pierre could not hear of them without emotion.

"My friends," said Davidoff to the lovers, "we have kept our promise to you, and you are now happy. This is very well, but even of the best things it is possible to have too much. Mlle. de Vignes is not yet strong enough to allow of her enjoying anything, even happiness, in excess. She has had enough now for one occasion. Besides, you will have plenty of time to see each other in the future."

But Juliette pleaded with her mother for a quarter of an hour's grace, and Mme. de Vignes had not the courage to cloud, by a refusal, the lovely face which was now radiant with joy for the first time in so many months. She felt that the victory was already gained, and that youth and love had triumphed over death. The feeling of bitterness which she had cherished against Laurier as the cause of so much unhappiness vanished when she saw the transformation his presence had effected in Juliette.

They sat, then, oblivious of time, listening to the account Pierre gave of his life in the little Corsican hamlet. Juliette already loved Agostino, Marietta, the old mother and the good cure. And the promise made by Pierre to his friends at Torrevecchio to return to see them was mentally renewed by her in the fullness of her heart. It struck midnight before they separated.

"You will not see us to-morrow," said Davidoff to his patient with a smile.

And as her face suddenly clouded—

"We must not think of you alone, dear child," he said, gently. "We have still to perform another cure, more difficult than yours. We start for Trouville to-morrow morning to see your brother."

In an instant the momentary selfishness, which had caused her to forget everything but her own happiness, disappeared. She remembered the painful position in which she and her mother were placed, and all the clearness of her judgment at once returned to her. She pressed Davidoff's hand, and said to Pierre:

"You are right; go, both of you and do for my brother what you have done for me! If you succeed you cannot indeed make me more grateful, but you can make me more happy."

Then, taking her lover by the hand, she led him to her mother. Mme. de Vignes opened her arms to the prodigal son, and as Pierre received her kiss, he felt that now indeed he was absolved.

CHAPTER VII.

There was to be a grand breakfast at the house of Clemence on this day, which was the first day of the races. A number of her friends had arrived from Paris the evening before, and the actress, who had met them at the Casino, had then invited them. Among them were Prince Patrizzi, Duverney, a painter of the nude of the modern school, and a wit who still preserved the gay good-humor of his youthful days; Baron Tresorier, a stockbroker and one of the best swordsmen of Paris; Berneville a sportsman who rode like a professional jockey, and who had broken his collarbone seven times riding steeplechases; the Duke de Faucigny, the youngest member of the Chamber of Deputies, an uncompromising legitimist who had strenuously advocated the claims of Don Carlos; Burat, the theatrical lawyer, the possessor of the most biting tongue of any member of the profession, a regular attendant at first nights and an ardent collector of paintings; and Selim Nuno, who had come to see his mare run for the Agricultural sweepstakes, and who concealed his anxiety as to the result under an affected gayety. The women were Andree de Taillebourg, Mariette de Fontenoy, Laure d'Evreux, and Sophie Viroflay, all beautiful women, dressed to perfection. The party was arranged for the entire day. After breakfasting at Clemence's they were to be driven on Nuno's coach to the race-course. On their return, after making some changes in their toilettes, they were to meet at half-past seven at the Roches-Noires, where Tresorier had invited them to dine. Afterwards they were all to go to the Casino for a dance. Jacques took a turn through the gardens with Patrizzi, while Clemence chatted with Nuno, who had seated himself beside her.

"Do you know that Jacques offers ten to one against Mandragora?" she said. "He has won so much at play during the last few days that he thinks everything is going to succeed with him."

Nuno reddened with anger, and rising to his feet with an effort,—

"I'll take his bet, and for more than he would be willing to stake," he said, "I am sure of my mare."

"But are you sure of your jockey?" asked Berneville. "You know that Chadwat pulled La Bouverie's horse the other day at Caen."

"I am not uneasy: Peterson cannot get as much from any one else for losing as he can get from me for winning."

"But, my dear Nuno," said Andree de Taillebourg, "what you have promised to Petersen will not give legs to Mandragora."

"The mare is a first-rate animal," retorted the banker.

"Bah, she is not worth a straw."

"I'll lay even odds on her against the field," cried Nuno furiously.

"Nuno, you will make yourself ill," said Sophie Viroflay. "There is nothing so dangerous as to fly into a passion before eating."

At this moment the doors leading into the dining-room were thrown open, and the maitre d'hotel announced breakfast. Clemence took the arm of Faucigny; Jacques, who had reentered with Patrizzi, offered his to Sophie Viroflay, and the guests proceeded to the dining-room.

This was a magnificent apartment hung with Chinese silk, with furniture of carved wood, which opened into the conservatory on the one side and into the garden on the other. Three large bay-windows of stained glass, representing strange flowers and fantastic birds, looked on a terrace, in the centre of which was an imposing flight of steps leading to a lawn bordered with flowers. Through these windows, open to the breeze, the sunlight streamed in. The turf of the lawn was of an emerald green, and the sanded walks shone dazzling white in the sunshine. The blue sky faded in the distance into a violet hue. The heat and silence tended to produce a feeling of well-being, and the guests of Clemence, yielding unconsciously to the influence of the day, gave themselves up to unrestrained gayety.

In the midst of the general merriment Jacques alone remained grave, as if some secret remorse preyed upon his mind. Delivered for the time being from his pecuniary anxieties, his thoughts reverted to those whom he had so cruelly wronged in order to procure this last supply of money. In the midst of this gay company he was possessed by the most lugubrious ideas. He looked at the brilliant table laden with flowers, silver and crystal; he observed those who were seated around it, and he saw that they were careless and happy: He alone felt the pangs of remorse for an ill-spent life. None of the others were troubled either in mind or heart. He heard their bursts of laughter and their jests; and thus it was with them every day; the same unconcerned gayety, the same round of pleasure.

For him, too, every day was the same, embittered by anguish which he could not subdue. His eyes were fastened on Clemence and Faucigny, who were talking together in a low voice opposite him. He could not hear their words, but he divined what they were saying. The duke in his soft and insinuating voice was paying court to the actress, and she was listening to him with a smile. Jacques' brow contracted with a look of pain. "It is because I am growing morose that she is getting tired of me," he said to himself. He emptied one after another the glasses that stood beside his plate, and this mingling of the different wines brought a flush to his cheeks.

Suddenly he heard Patrizzi calling to him across the table.

"Tell me, Jacques," he said, "does not this breakfast remind you of our dinner at Monte Carlo? Some of the men and most of the women here today were present on that occasion. We were not as gay as we are now. And the stories that were told! Do you remember?"

"And that reminds me, how is it that the Russian doctor who is travelling with Woreseff is not here?" said Andree de Taillebourg.

"He has been in Paris for the last five days," said Patrizzi.

At these words Jacques fancied he saw the pale and sorrowful image of Juliette rise before him. She was seated in the drawing-room where he had spent so many evenings while he was still an obedient son and affectionate brother. Madame de Vignes was bending anxiously over her daughter, and Davidoff, standing beside them, was looking at them with pitying eyes. It seemed to the young man that his mother had uttered his name, and that the doctor had answered her by shaking his head sadly. Was it not he who ought to be at the side of these two women? Why should it be left to this stranger to console his mother and his sister? A voice murmured in his ear: "It is because you have refused to fulfil your duty; because you have sacrificed your mother to your passion for gambling and your sister to your love for a coquette; because you are a coward and an ingrate."

He burst into a sudden fit of laughter, inexorable and terrible to those who heard him, which drew upon him the attention of all the guests. His face was pale, his lips were tightly drawn, and his eyes were gleaming.

"Yes, yes," he cried, without heeding their astonishment. "The dinner at Monte Carlo was not so gay as this breakfast. I was dying then, for one thing, and to-day I am well—oh, very well, thanks to Davidoff, who has propounded an admirable theory respecting the transmigration of souls. You have not forgotten it Patrizzi? Nor you, Tresorier? ..He told us a story about a young Russian girl—a curious story, indeed! And what an amusing story-teller Davidoff is! No one among us took his story seriously, not even you, Patrizzi, although you are a Neapolitan, and consequently superstitious. For you believe in the evil eye, do you not, Prince?"

"Do not jest about these things," responded Patrizzi, who became suddenly grave, and made with the two fingers of his left hand a quick gesture behind his back.

"Ah, ha!" cried Jacques, sarcastically; "did you see the gesture of the Prince? He wants to charm away ill-luck. He believes in the jettatura; yet he did not believe in the theories of Davidoff. No one believed in them, no one except Pierre Laurier. But every one knows the poor fellow was mad!"

Must Keep the Curtains Up.

"In London it is strictly against the law for the driver of any public conveyance to allow the curtains of his vehicle to be pulled down," said a man who has visited the English metropolis. "By day or night the windows of cabs, hansoms, carriages, or what not, whether drawn by horses or propelled by electric power, must be so open to public inspection as to allow a plain view of those occupying the interior. A closed rig wouldn't get a block before a London bobby would nab its driver and hale him to a magistrate's office, where he would get no mercy. The law is based on the theory that closed vehicles lend themselves easily to the commission of robbery or murder and that they may also assist a criminal to make his escape."

Teakwood.

The fact that teakwood is coarse-grained, greasy to the touch and possesses an offensive odor kept it in disrepute with English shipbuilders until 1897, when British shipbuilding and railway interests began to recognize the value of Indian teak. During the next seven years all the shipbuilding countries in the world joined in an ever-increasing demand for this timber until its prices were forced up to a figure much beyond their normal rates. It has practically become the staple of the local wood industry for the greater part of the entire Indian continent. Teak is being freely planted by the Indian forestry service in the important civil stations all over India, even as far north as Saharanpur, Debra Dun and Lahore.—Argonaut.

Prudence and Shaving.

The classic case of a king who knew better than to let anybody else shave him is that of Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, who appears to have been unable to shave himself, for he is said to have resorted to the uncomfortable device of singeing off his beard with hot walnut shells. We may suspect that Napoleon I. was another case of the kind. Rogers asked Talleyrand whether Napoleon shaved himself. "Yes," replied Talleyrand; "one born to be a king has some one to shave him, but those who acquire kingdoms shave themselves." That way of putting it pleasantly emphasizes the practical superiority of the parvenu to the helpless spoiled child of heredity, but prudence probably entered into the matter also, if Talleyrand's statement was correct.—London Standard.

BETTER THAN SPANKING

Spanking does not cure children of bed-wetting. There is a constitutional cause for this trouble. Mrs. M. Summers, Box W. 8, Windsor, Ont., will send free to any mother her successful home treatment, with full instructions. Send no money but write her to-day if your children trouble you in this way. Don't blame the child, the chances are it can't help it. This treatment also cures adults and aged people troubled with urine difficulties by day or night.

A TRANSITION TIME

(Rochester Post-Express)

It is a time of soul hunger, of passionate yearning for something that shall be satisfying, and there never was less agreement as to what life is, means, is worth and leads to. Like him who gained the whole world and lost his own soul, humanity has yet to learn—and is now to learn, as we may hope—that only when life is lived according to the great law shall everything else be added to it, and that thus only is it to be enriched beyond our imaginings with contentment and joy.

From an age which had come to set things above the soul, self-seeking above service, we are in stormy transition to an age of clearer conceptions and higher ideals. And this is by far the most momentous passing from epoch to epoch of which we have knowledge.

Genuine Wit.

Benjamin Moore, the second bishop of New York, was a man noted in his day for his ready wit—a quality that his wife apparently shared with him. A dinner was given by some one of Gouverneur Morris' friends when he was about to depart for Europe. Bishop Moore and his wife were of the party. In the course of the conversation Mr. Morris observed that since he was going abroad he had made his will and, turning to Bishop Moore, said to him:

"My reverend friend, I have bequeathed to you my complete stock of impudence."

Bishop Moore replied. "Sir, you are not only very kind, but you are very generous. You have left me by far the largest portion of your estate."

Mrs. Moore immediately added, "My dear, you have come into possession of your inheritance remarkably soon."—Youth's Companion.

Gentlemen,—Ever since coming home from the Boer war I have been bothered with running fever sores on my legs. I tried many salves and liniments; also doctored continuously for the blood, but got no permanent relief, till last winter, when my mother got me to try MINARD'S LINIMENT, the effect of which was almost magical. Two bottles completely cured me, and I have since worked every working day since.

THE PEOPLE TO BLAME.

(Rochester Post Express.)

In the last analysis it is the people who must blame themselves for misgovernment. The worst possible grafting and incompetent administration is possible under the best charter that can be written, if bad and inefficient men are elected, just as an excellent administration is secured by honest, intelligent and experienced officials even when trammeled by a defective system. In municipal government men are of more importance than measures.

THE FARM VACATION.

(Detroit Free Press)

Seriously, the farm vacation is an enjoyable one, of course. But the lazy, idling vacation is not a good thing for the average man or woman. Change of employment such as comes to the city worker who leaves four walls to work in the open field beside the farmer is invaluable to the individual, even if it does result [illegible] in sore and stiffened muscles. So coax your farmer friend for permission to help him in the hay and grain fields. He'll give it.

THE PLAY INSTINCT.

(St. Catharines Standard.)

No normal man ever gets wholly away from the instinct. Play is absolutely necessary in the growth of a healthy child, and it is no less important in the life of grown-ups. You may call it relaxation, variation from the details of work, or something else, but the principle is unchanged. Men who are wholly given up to one thing grow narrow, carbid, and unhealthy. It is not medicine or doctor's advice they need to make them feel better, but the exercise of a little common sense that will cause them to get some satisfaction in their work, join some sport and play the game. It does not matter very much whether it is golf, bowling, tennis, riding or just croquet, so long as they play it.

POWER OF RAINDROPS.

Immense Electrical Energy Wasted in Heavy Shower.

There is a certain amount of power in a falling raindrop, as may be demonstrated by any one who will so dispose a small water wheel that the drop may strike it at a proper angle. Such a drop is, indeed an infinitesimal waterfall. Its energy is easily to be measured.

Multiply this bit of energy by the number which designates all the drops of a shower, and you have more power, the power of a very considerable waterfall. If, again, the shower be supposed to last for a period of hours, he who takes the trouble to estimate the energy exerted by its falling drops combined may acquire at least a faint idea of the energy in nature that is quite unavailable as yet for the use of man.

A severe rain storm suggested these thoughts to an English man of science, who forthwith proceeded to calculate the amount of power that was wasted in the downpour, at least so far as human purpose was concerned. The problem was one of no great difficulty, inasmuch as all the elements were known.

The full force of the rain endured for ten hours. It affected a territory of approximately ten square miles. The entire rainfall amounted to exactly 4.17 inches, according to the accurate measurement of the weather department men. The average height of the rain clouds was 5,000 feet.

With these facts known it was a simple matter of arithmetic to find that in the ten hours of the storm something like 10,000,000,000 gallons of water had fallen over a distance of 5,000 feet.

That was a majestic cataract, for the time being at least, comparing very favorably in volume and height with any that exists upon earth. Its energy, as the scientist figured, it was equivalent to no less than 15,000,000 horse-power hours.

That power, converted into electricity, would light a considerable city for a period of 425 days.

Ten square miles is but an infinitesimal portion of the earth's surface, hardly a pin point on the map. A single rain storm, no matter how great the precipitation, is but the merest fraction of the vast annual fall of water from the skies. What, then, must be the energy in the whole vast volume of water that pours down from above in the course of an entire year?

And what as the scientist himself asks, would be the effect upon the industries of the world could all this power be economically harnessed to the use of mankind?

Putting the K in Kant.

Kant, the Scoto-German, began his name with an alien "k" on the same principle that caused Mudroch, the Scottish coal gas discoverer, to bring his to an end with a "k." If you turn to Murdoch's biographers you find them explaining that Murdoch with a "k" is the English form of Murdoch with an "h." But the great gas man himself explained that he made the change in spelling "to oblige the English, among whom he lived." He found that they had a difficulty in giving "the full guttural pronunciation" to the last syllable, and so he made things easy.—London Chronicle.

CAVALRY HORSES.

The Loads They Have to Carry in the Armies of Europe.

The British cavalry is armed with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, the magazine of which holds ten rounds; the sword, which is carried by all ranks except signallers, and the revolver, carried by warrant officers, staff sergeants, sergeants, trumpeters and drivers. Each trooper carries 100 rounds of ammunition in a bandolier over the left shoulder. Lancer regiments carry the lance. Each cavalryman, like the infantryman, carries an emergency and the "iron" ration and a ration for his horse. Then there is the kit. Altogether the British troop horses carry about twenty stone (280 pounds).

The regular Russian cavalry are armed with sword, rifle and bayonet, and each man carries 60 rounds of ammunition. There are the two days' corn and hay ration, a cloak and an intrenching tool. The cavalryman's kit, two days' rations, spare horse shoes, horse blanket, canvas bucket and a mess tin go to form the complete equipment and weigh altogether about 110 pounds. The Cossack pony carries about seventeen stone. The average weight carried by the Indian troop horse when ready for war is about nineteen stone. The Austrian troopers carry a weight of between twenty-one and twenty-two stone, and the average in the French and German armies is about the same.—Man-

Hobart Pasha.

The Turkish navy of the past owed almost its existence to an English sailor, Hobart Pasha, a bold buccaneer of the Elizabethan period, who by some strange perverseness of fate was born into the Victorian age. He retired from the English navy in 1863, and during the American war he became a blockade runner with hair-breadth escapes innumerable. After the war he entered the Turkish service, suppressed the Cretan rebellion by intercepting the supplies from Greece and then re-organized the Turkish fleet so well that the Sultan appointed him marshal of the empire. Hobart Pasha also enjoyed the unique distinction of being twice struck off the British navy list for breach of the foreign enlistment act and twice reinstated there. And he died in 1886 with the rank of a British vice-admiral.—London Globe.

Dr. Chase's Nerve Food

With the Child.

They are such dear, familiar feet that go
Along the path with ours—feet fast or slow,
And trying to keep pace; if they mistake
Or tread upon some flower that we would take
Upon our breast, or bruise some reed,
Or crush poor hope until it bleed,
We must be mute,
Not turning quickly to impute
Grave fault; for they and we
Have such a little way to go—can be Together such a little while along the way—
We will be patient while we may.

So many little faults we find.
We see them, for not blind
Is love. We see them; but if you and I
Perhaps remember them, some by and by,
They will not be
Faults then—grave faults—to you and me,
But just odd ways—mistakes or even less—
Remembrances to bless.
Days change so many things—yes hours;
We see so differently in sun and showers.
Mistaken words to-night
May be so cherished by to-morrow's light.
We must be patient; for we know
There's such a little way to go.

Making a Distinction.

"What is the difference, asked the teacher, "between caution and cowardice."

HONEST MANUFACTURERS.

(Ottawa Citizen)

The Canadian manufacturer is, on the whole, an honest producer of goods. To prove this it is only necessary to review the quality of Canadian made goods and to analyze the government report of products made in the Dominion. There are some dishonest contractors, some dishonest and disreputable manufacturers and some tricky individuals in all lines of commercial life, but it is likewise true that most people know of these firms and dealers and know them for what they are. That in itself is condemnation and proves once more that honesty alone pays.

Paper Bullets.

Bullets of paper or tallow have been found to be productive of far greater damage than metal ones when used for short distance firing. During some experiments in this direction it was proved that, whereas a metal bullet penetrated a deal plank an inch in thickness and left a neat hole, a pasteboard bullet had a far greater destructive effect upon the target. A paper bullet passing through six pieces of tin placed at a distance of a foot apart buckled them up completely, whereas a metal bullet merely left a small round hole.

LOTHA TRIUMPHANT.

The South African campaign, conducted by General Botha, may have only been a side show to the great war on the continent of Europe, but it has been carried on in a masterly manner and brought to a successful conclusion. German South Africa is now a thing of the past, all the German forces having succumbed to Botha, and their slice of Africa is now under the control of Britain and forms a part of the British Empire. The Japs drove the Germans out of China, the New Zealanders captured some German islands in the Pacific, and now Botha has taken from them their African holdings. Thus Germany has been bereft of the colonies she once held. Instead of securing a place in the sun, she has lost what she did have, and is now a "shut in" among the nations of the world.

Gen. Botha, shortly after the war began, had a rebellion on his hands, which he soon suppressed. But no sooner did he get through with this than he was called upon to repel an invasion of Germans from German South Africa. In this he has been successful, despite almost insuperable difficulties. The country he has thus brought within the British sphere has an area of 322,450 square miles. But Botha does not propose to rest with these achievements. His Government has already offered the old country a force for service in France, and the offer has been accepted. Botha is one of the great men of this war.

A GENEROUS TRIBUTE.

The other day one of our Tory contemporaries made an attack on Lord Haldane, and through him on Sir Wilfrid Laurier, reciting the old story that Sir Wilfrid once made some complimentary remarks about the Kaiser. It was only the other day that Lloyd-George stated that up to within a short time of the war the British people looked upon the Kaiser as a friend of theirs. Lord Haldane was not kicked out of the British Cabinet because of his friendship for the Germans. He stepped down and out to make room for new comers into the Coalition Government. Some idea of what his lordship has done for Britain in this crisis will be seen by the remarks of Winston Churchill, made at Dundee recently. He said:

"No more sincere patriot has served the Crown. There never has been an occasion in the Cabinets of the last seven years in which I have sat that, as the need arose, Lord Haldane has not from his great knowledge of the German governmental system warned us to be on our guard against the dangerous side of their nature.

"There never has been a time when he has not supported every provision for the defence of this country, military or naval. He it was who entered into those intricate arrangements with France which enabled our army to be so swiftly brought to the scene of action, just in the nick of time. He it was who prepared that Expeditionary Army in the face of much opposition and in days when every penny was hard to get. He it was who organized the Territorial Force which has so splendidly vindicated itself and its founder, and upon whose gallantry, discipline, and numbers the weight and even the success of our military operations hitherto have notably if not mainly depended.

"Till a few months ago all the land forces which we employed in this war, which we put in the field, were the products of Lord Haldane's organization, and in the fateful and convulsive days before Great Britain drew the sword of honor, when the chill of doubt struck into many hearts whether we should act as we were bound—in those days no man stood closer to Sir Edward Grey and no man saw more clearly where our duty led."

This is a tribute which few men deserve. It is one that does credit both to Churchill and Haldane.

Pressure is being brought upon the British Government to declare cotton contraband. Out of a desire to please the United States Government, Premier Asquith has hesitated to put it on that list. But it is said that in doing this the Government is playing into the hands of the Germans and thus allowing them to get what is a necessity to them for carrying on the war.

Von Jagew, the German Foreign Minister, complains bitterly because Britain has cut the cable between Germany and America. But the Germans have destroyed wireless stations wherever they could find them, and would have cut the cable at Falkland Islands only the British squadron sent the German ships to the bottom before they had a chance to cut it.

It is said that the German submarines are being driven farther and farther away from the British coast. This is not only because Germany has her largest submarines at work, but because they have been driven to a far greater extent than is realized from the channels where shipping throngs thickest by the activity of British destroyers, patrol boats, armed merchant vessels and by other means.

According to a United States Commerce report, one great drawback to the United States or Canada assuming their proper share in the trade of Russia, and taking advantage of the immense business opportunities that will be open in this country, at least after the close of the war, is the general ignorance, among Canadians and Americans, of the Russian language. Until the war started, German was to a great extent the commercial language of Russia; the representatives in Russia of German firms usually took pains to make themselves proficient in speaking and writing Russian. Now, however, the German language is prohibited in Russia, so that Russian hereafter must of necessity be used in all but the few instances where Russian business men have a knowledge of English. Moral—Learn to speak the Russian language.

Crown Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria, brother of the Queen of Belgium, who is commanding the Sixth German Army Corps in Belgium, recently issued the following proclamation to his troops: "Soldiers of the Sixth German Army Corps,—We are fortunate to have opposed to us the English troops—the troops of that people whose envy has been at work for years to surround us with enemies to strangle us. We owe to them the present bloody war. Therefore take reprisals for the cunning of the enemy and for the sacrifices we have made when we now meet them. Show them that it is not so easy to wipe out the Germans of history now that we are face to face with an enemy who is the greatest obstacle of peace." This man, who is assisting to ravish his own sister's country, may meet the English sooner than he thinks. THE Changeling

For a long time after finishing the above, Madam Conway sat rapt in thought. Could it be possible that during all her life she had labored under a mistake? Were birth and family rank really of no consequence? Was George just as worthy of respect as if he had descended directly from the Scottish race of Douglas, instead of belonging to that vulgar woman? "It may be so in America," she sighed, "but it is not true of England," and sincerely hoping that Theo's remark concerning Mr. Carrollton might prove true, she laid aside the letter, and for the remainder of the day busied herself with preparations for the return of Arthur Carrollton, who had written that he should be with them on the first of December.

The day came, and, unusually excited, Maggie flitted from room to room, seeing that everything was in order, wondering how he would meet her, and if he had forgiven her for having been so cross at their last interview in the woods. The effect of every suitable dress in her wardrobe was tried, and she decided at last upon a crimson and black merino, which harmonized well with her dark eyes and hair. The dress was singularly becoming, and, feeling quite satisfied with the face and form reflected by her mirror, she descended to the parlor, where any doubts she might have had concerning her personal appearance was put to flight by Anna Jeffrey, who, with a feeling of envy, asked "if she had the scarlet fever!" referring to her bright color, and saying, "she did not think too red a face becoming to anyone, particularly to Margaret, to whom it gave a blowsy look, such as she had more than once heard Mr. Carrollton say he did not like to see!"

Margaret knew well that the dark-browed girl would give almost anything for the roses blooming on her cheeks; so she made no reply, but simply wished Anna would return to England, as for the last two months she had talked of doing. It was not quite dark and Mr. Carrollton, if he came that night, would be with them soon. The car whistle had sounded some time before, and Maggie's quick ear caught at last the noise of the bells in the distance. Nearer and nearer they came; the sleigh was at the door, and, forgetting everything but her own happiness, Maggie ran out to meet their guest, nor turned her glowing face away when he stooped down to kiss her. He had forgiven her ill-nature, she was sure of that, and very joyfully she led the way to the parlor, where, as the full light of the lamp fell upon him, she started involuntarily, he seemed so changed.

"Are you sick?" she asked, and her voice expressed the deep anxiety she felt.

Forcing back a slight cough, and smiling down upon her, he answered cheerfully: "Oh, no, not sick. Canada air does not agree with me; that's all. I took a severe cold soon after my arrival in Montreal"; and the cough he had attempted to stifle now burst forth, sounding to Maggie, who thought only of consumption, like an echo from the grave.

"Oh, I am so sorry," she answered, sadly, and her eyes filled with tears, which she did not try to conceal, for, looking through the window across the snow-clad field on which the winter moon was shining, she saw instinctively another grave beside that of her mother.

Madam Conway had not yet appeared, and as Anna Jeffrey just then left the room, Mr. Carrollton was for some moments alone with Maggie. Winding his arm around her waist, and giving her a most expressive look, he said: "Maggie, are those tears for me?"

Instantly the bright blushes stole over Maggie's face and neck, for she remembered the time when once before he had asked her a similar question. Not now, as then, did she turn from him away, but she answered frankly: "Yes, they are. You look so pale and thin, I'm sure you must be ill."

Whether Mr. Carrollton liked blowsy complexions or not, he certainly admired Maggie's at that moment, and, drawing her closer to his side, he said, half playfully, half earnestly: "To see you thus anxious for me, Maggie, more than atones for your waywardness when last we parted. You are forgiven, but you are unnecessarily alarmed. I shall be better soon. Hillsdale air will do me good. Will you nurse me, Maggie, just as my sister Helen would do, were she here?"

The right chord was touched, and all the soft, womanly qualities of Maggie Miller's nature were called forth by Arthur Carrollton's failing health. For several weeks after his arrival at Hillsdale he was a confirmed invalid, lying all day upon the sofa in the parlor, while Maggie read to him from books which he selected partly for the purpose of amusing himself, and more for the sake of benefiting her and improving her taste for literature. At other times he would tell her of his home beyond the sea, and Maggie, listening to him while he described its airy halls, its noble parks, its shaded walks and musical fountains, would sometimes wish aloud that she might one day see that spot which seemed to her so much like paradise. He wished so, too, and oftentimes when, with half-closed eyes, his mind was wandering amid the scenes of his youth he saw at his side a queenly figure with features like those of Maggie Miller, who each day was stealing more and more into his heart, where love for other than his nearest friends had never before found entrance. She had many faults, he knew, but these he possessed both the will and the power to correct, and as day after day she sat reading at his side, he watched her bright, animated face, thinking what a splendid woman she would make, and wondering if an American rose like her would bear transplanting to English soil.

Very complacently Madam Conway looked on, reading aright the admiration which Arthur Carrollton evinced for Margaret, who in turn was far from being uninterested in him. Anna Jeffrey, too, watched them jealously, pondering in her own mind some means by which she could, if possible, annoy Margaret. Had she known how far matters had gone with Henry Warner, she would unhesitatingly have told it to Arthur Carrollton; but so quietly had the affair been managed that she knew comparatively but little. This little, however, she determined to tell him, together with any embellishments she might see fit to use. Accordingly, one afternoon, when he had been there two months or more, Maggie had gone with her grandmother to ride, she went down to the parlor under pretense of getting a book to read. He was much better now, but, feeling somewhat fatigued from a walk he had taken in the yard, he was reclining upon a sofa. Leaning over the rocking chair which stood near by, Anna inquired for his health, and then asked how long since he had heard from home.

He liked to talk of England, and as there was nothing to him particularly disagreeable in Anna Jeffrey, he bade her be seated. Very willingly she complied with his request, and after talking awhile of England, announced her intention of returning home the last of March. "My aunt prefers remaining with Madam Conway, but I don't like America," said she, "and I often wonder why I am here."

"I supposed you came to be with your aunt, who, I am told, has been to you a second mother," answered Mr. Carrollton, and Anna replied: "You are right. She could not be easy until she got me here, where I know I am not wanted; at least one would be glad to have me leave."

Mr. Carrollton looked inquiringly at her, and Anna continued: "I fully supposed I was to be a companion for Margaret; but instead of that she treats me with the utmost coolness, making me feel keenly my position as a dependent."

"That does not seem at all like Maggie," said Mr. Carrollton, and with a meaning smile far more expressive than words, Anna answered: "She may not always be alike, but, hush! don't I hear bells?" and she ran to the window, saying as she resumed her seat: "I thought they had come, but I was mistaken. I dare say, Maggie has coaxed her grandmother to drive by the postoffice, thinking there might be a letter from Henry Warner."

Her manner affected Mr. Carrollton perceptibly, but he made no reply; and Anna asked "if he knew Mr. Warner?"

"I saw him in Worcester, I believe," he said, and Anna continued: "Do you think him a suitable husband for a girl like Maggie?"

There was a deep flush on Arthur Carrollton's cheek, and his lips were whiter than their wont as he answered: "I know nothing of him, neither did I suppose Miss Miller ever thought of him for a husband."

"I know she did at one time," said his tormentor, turning the leaves of her book, with well-feigned indifference. "It was not any secret, or I should not speak of it; of course Madam Conway was greatly opposed to it, too, and forbade her writing to him; but how the matter is now, I do not positively know, though I am quite sure they are engaged."

"Isn't it very close here? Will you please to open the hall door?" said Mr. Carrollton, suddenly panting for breath; and, satisfied with her work, Anna did as desired, and then left him alone.

"Maggie engaged!" he exclaimed, "engaged when I was hoping to win her for myself!" and a sharp pang shot through his heart as he thought of giving to another the beautiful girl who had grown so into his love. "But I am glad I learned it in time," he continued, hurriedly walking the floor, "knew it ere I had done Henry Warner a wrong by telling her of my love, and asking her to go with me to my English home, which will be desolate without her. This is why she repulsed me in the woods. She knew I ought not to speak of love to her. Why did I see it before, or why has not Madam Conway told me the truth? She at least has deceived me," and with a feeling of keen disappointment he continued to pace the floor, one moment resolving to leave Hillsdale at once, and again thinking how impossible it was to tear himself away.

Arthur Carrollton was a perfectly honorable man, and once assured of Maggie's engagement, he would neither by word or deed do aught to which the most fastidious lover could object, and Henry Warner's rights were as safe with him as with the truest of friends. But was Maggie really engaged? Might there not be some mistake? He hoped so at least, and, alternating between hope and fear, he waited impatiently the return of Maggie, who, with each thought of losing her, seemed ten-fold dearer to him than she had ever been before; and when at last she came bounding in, he could scarcely refrain from folding her in his arms and asking of her to think again ere she gave another than himself the right of calling her his bride. But she is not mine, he thought, and so he merely took her cold hands within his own, rubbing them until they were warm. Then seating himself by her side upon the sofa, he spoke of her ride, asking casually if she called at the postoffice.

"No, we did not drive that way," she answered, readily, adding that the postoffice had few attractions for her now, as no one wrote to her save Theo.

She evidently spoke the truth, and with a feeling of relief Mr. Carrollton thought that possibly Miss Jeffrey might have been mistaken; but he would know at all hazards, even though he ran the risk of being thought extremely rude. Accordingly, that evening, after Mrs. Jeffrey and Anna had retired to their room, and while Madam Conway was giving some household directions in the kitchen, he asked her to come and sit by him as he lay upon the sofa, himself placing her chair where the lamplight would fall fully upon her face and reveal its every expression. Closing up the piano, she complied with his request, and then awaited in silence for what he was to say.

"Maggie," he began, "you may think me bold, but there is something I very much wish to know, and which you, if you choose, can tell me. From what I have heard, I am led to think you are engaged. Will you tell me if this is true?"

The bright color faded out from Maggie's cheek, while her eyes grew darker than before, and still she did not speak. Not that she was angry with him for asking her that question; but because the answer, which, if made at all, must be yes, was hard to utter. And yet why should she hesitate to tell him the truth at once?

Alas for thee, Maggie Miller! The fancied love you feel for Harry Warner is fading fast away. Arthur Carrollton is a dangerous rival, and even now you cannot meet the glance of his expressive eyes without a blush! Your better judgment acknowledged his superiority to Henry long ago, and now in your heart there is room for none save him.

"Maggie," he said, again stretching out his hand to take the unresisting one which lay upon her lap, "you need not make me other answer save that so plainly written on your face. You are engaged, and may Heaven's blessing attend both you and yours."

At this moment Madam Conway appeared, and, fearing her inability to control her feelings longer, Maggie precipitately left the room. Going to her chamber, she burst into a passionate fit of weeping, one moment blaming Mr. Carrollton for having learned her secret, and the next chiding herself for wishing to withhold from him a knowledge of her engagement.

"It is not that I love Henry less, I am sure," she thought, and, laying her head upon her pillow, she recalled everything which had passed between herself and her affianced husband, trying to bring back the olden happiness with which he had listened to his words of love. But it would not come; there was a barrier in the way, Arthur Carrollton as he looked when he said so sadly: "You need not tell me, Maggie."

"Oh, I wish he had not asked me that question," she sighed, "it has put such dreadful thoughts into my head. And yet I love Henry as well as ever; I know I do, I am sure of it, or, if I do not, I will," and repeating to herself again and again the words, "I will, I will," she fell asleep.

Will, however, is not always subservient to one's wishes, and during the first few days succeding the incident of that night Maggie often found herself wishing that Arthur Carrollton had never come to Hillsdale, he made her so wretched, so unhappy. Insensibly, too, she became a very little unamiable, speaking pettishly to her grandmother, disrespectfully to Mrs. Jeffrey, haughtily to Anna, and rarely to Mr. Carrollton, who, after the lapse of two or three weeks began to talk of returning home in the same vessel with Anna Jeffrey, at which time his health would be fully restored. Then, indeed, did Maggie awake to the reality that while her hand was plighted to one, she loved another—not as in days gone by she had loved Henry Warner, but with a deeper, more absorbing love. With this knowledge, too, there came the thought that Arthur Carrollton had once loved her, and but for the engagement now so much regretted, he would ere this have told her so. But it was too late! too late! He would never feel toward her again as he once had felt, and bitter tears she shed as she contemplated the fast coming future, when Arthur Carrollton would be gone, or, shuddering, thought of the time when Henry Warner would return to claim her promise.

"I cannot, cannot marry him," she cried, "until I've torn that other image from my heart," and then for days she strove to recall the olden love in vain; for, planted on the sandy soil of childhood, as it were, it had been outgrown, and would never again spring into life. "I will write to him exactly how it is", she said at last; "will tell him the affection I felt for him could not have been what a wife should feel for her husband. I was young, had seen nothing of the world, knew nothing of gentlemen's society, and when he came, with his handsome face and winning ways, my interest was awakened. Sympathy, too, for his misfortune increased that interest, which grandma's opposition tended in no wise to diminish. But it has died out, that fancied love, and I cannot bring it back. Still, if he insists I will keep my word, and, when he comes next autumn I will not tell him No."

Maggie was very calm when this decision was reached, and opening her writing-desk she wrote just as she said she would, begging of him to forgive her if she had done him wrong, and beseeching Rose to comfort him as only a sister like her could do. "And remember," she wrote at the close, "remember that sooner than see you very unhappy, I will marry you, will try to be a faithful wife; though, Henry, I would rather not—oh, so much rather not."

The letter was finished, and then Maggie took it to her grandmother, who read it eagerly, for in it she saw a fulfilment of her wishes. Very closely had she watched both Mr Carrollton and Maggie, readily divining the truth, that something was wrong between them. But from past experience she deemed it wiser not to interfere directly. Mr. Carrollton's avowed intention of returning to England however startled her, and she was revolving some method of procedure when Margaret brought her the letter.

"I am happier than I can well express," she said, when she had finished reading it. "Of course you have my permission to send it. But what has changed you, Maggie? Has another taken the place of Henry Warner?"

"Don't ask me, grandma," cried Mag, covering her face with her hands, "don't ask me, for indeed I can only tell you that I am very unhappy."

A little skillful questioning on Madam Conway's part sufficed to explain the whole—how constant association with Arthur Carrollton had won for him a place in Maggie's heart, which Henry Warner had never filled; how the knowledge that she loved him as she could love no other one had faintly revealed itself to her on the night when he asked her if she were engaged, and had burst upon her with overwhelming power when she heard that he was going home.

"He will never think of me again, I know," she said; "but, with my present feelings I cannot marry Henry, unless he insists upon it."

"A man seldom wishes to marry a woman who says she does not love him, and Henry Warner will not prove an exception," answered Madam Conway, and, comforted with this assurance, Mag folded up her letter, which was soon on its way to Cuba.

The next evening, as Madam Conway sat alone with Mr. Carrollton, she spoke of his return to England, expressing her sorrow, and asking why he did not remain with them longer.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON IV.

July 25, 1915.—Solomon Dedicates the Temple.—I Kings 8:53. Print 8:22-30.

Commentary.—I. Bringing in the ark (vs. 1-11.) The length of time occupied in building the temple was seven years. It was finished in the eighth month and was dedicated in the seventh month of the following year. The intervening eleven months may have been occupied in preparing the furnishings of the temple. At the time of the dedication there were assembled the leaders of all the tribes of Israel at Jerusalem, for this was to be one of the greatest events in the history of of the nation. Priest carried the ark of the covenant from Zion, where David had placed it during the early part of his reign, to Moriah. They went eastward down into the Tyropoeon valley and up on the other side to Moriah and the ark was deposited in the most holy place of the temple. In the ark were the tables of the covenant. The ark of the covenant was the symbol of the divine presence, and God manifested His presence in the temple after the sacred ark was placed therein. The cloud of glory filled the house of the Lord so that the priests were not able to minister. It was a most satisfactory evidence that the Lord was pleased with the efforts his people had put forth in his service and for his honor, that the divine glory filled the temple. They thus knew that their work was acceptable to God.

II. Blessing the people (vs. 12-21.) A platform had been erected for the occasion, and Solomon stood upon it to address the congregation, and kneeled upon it to pray. He first addressed the Lord, declaring that he had built for him a permanent place of abode. He then turned toward the people and blessed them, while they stood to hear his words. He gave the history of the building of the house. The thought of this enterprise was in the heart of David, but, because of his being much engaged in war, he was not allowed to build the temple. The Lord gave David the promise, however, that a son of his would accomplish the work. God commended David for his desire and interest in the matter. Solomon testified that the Lord had placed him upon the throne as his father's successor, and that he had built the house of the Lord. The king made particular reference to the ark of the covenant. The most holy place of the temple was set apart as a resting-place for the ark. This contained the covenant which God made with his people. This covenant was embodied in the tables of the Ten Commandments.

III. Solomon's prayer (vs. 22-53). 22. Solomon stood before the altar—From the account in 2 Chron. 6: 12, 13, we learn that he stood upon a platform and then kneeled down to pray. Spread forth his hands. This was a common custom in prayer, as now frequently those who are engaged in common prayer raise their hands toward heaven. 23. He said—The prayer of Solomon is recorded, and is the longest which is preserved to us in the scriptures. No God like thee—Solomon used adoration as well as supplication in his prayer. He showed his confidence in the God of Israel; and if the congregation joined heartily with him in his prayer, they were far from being inclined toward idolatry. He ascribed to him faithfulness and mercy. With all their heart—The condition upon which men then, as now, received the divine favor was to walk before him in sincerity, devotion and faith, or with all the heart. 24. Hast fulfilled it—The king gave God the glory for what had been done. He had fulfilled the promise which he has made to David. 25. Shall not fail thee a man. As the Lord had fulfilled the promise to David regarding the temple, so the king besought the Lord that the promise concerning a succession of kings to occupy the throne would be fulfilled. This promise was conditional upon David's descendants being obedient to the Lord. So that thy children—"If only thy children."—R. V. 26. And now—Solomon was in earnest to have his prayer answered, and he repeated his petition.

27. Will God indeed dwell on the earth—This question shows that Solomon had an exalted conception of God. Could it be that the Almighty would occupy a dwelling place among men? Heaven of heavens—The wide extent of creation, the vast expanse of the heavens. Cannot contain thee—This is an expression of faith in God's omnipresence. He had created the "heaven of heavens," and he was greater than his works. 28. Have thou respect—The Hebrew is, "Thou wilt have respect." Cam. Bib. 29. My name shall be there—This is equivalent to saying that God's presence would be in the temple, for his name indicates himself with all his attributes. Toward this place—For the king was not in the temple, but looking toward it, as would be the case with all future worshippers except the priests, who were allowed to enter into the building. Hence it came to pass than in foreign lands the Israelite turned his face in the direction of Jerusalem.—Cam. Bib. 30. In heaven thy dwelling place—While the temple, just being dedicated, was to be God's visible abode to his people, that is, his presence was to be manifested there, yet he was to be thought of as having his abode in heaven. When thou hearest, forgive—Solomon set forth in his prayer one of the most important works of Jehovah when he spoke of his forgiving sin. God alone can do this, and man's condition would be deplorable indeed if he could receive no mercy from God. "With the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption" (Psa. 130: 7).

31-53. In the remainder of his prayer Solomon besought the Lord for mercy for his people when they should be in distress. Their troubles would come as a result of their failure to obey and honor him. This prayer called for forgiveness for the people on condition that they confessed their sins, turned from them and asked the Lord for pardon, praying with their faces toward Jerusalem. The prayer covered times of drought, famine, pestilence and war. Not only might the prayer of the Israelite be heard, but even the stranger who turned toward God's people and prayed with his face toward the temple, would receive mercy. After the prayer was ended, Solomon pronounced a benediction upon the people. He referred to the fact that the Lord had separated Israel to be a people for himself and had taken a constant and careful interest in them. They were his inheritance. He had delivered them from Egyptian bondage and made them a nation. They were his delight.

Had A Lame Back
FOR A LONG TIME.

Sometimes Could Hardly
Turn In Bed.

When the back gets so bad and aches like a "toothache" you may rest assured that the kidneys are affected in some way.

On the first sign of a backache, Doan's Kidney Pills should be taken, and if this is done immediately you will save yourself many years of suffering from serious kidney trouble.

Mr. J. W. Fraser, Truro, N.S., writes: "I have had a lame back for a long time. Sometimes I could hardly turn over in bed, but after taking six boxes of Doan's Kidney Pills I find that my back is as strong as ever. I can't praise them enough."

Doan's Kidney Pills are 50c. per box, 3 boxes for $1.25; at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

When ordering direct specify "Doan's."

Questions.—In what year of Solomon's reign was the building of the temple begun? How long was it in being built? Describe the preparation of the materials. Where was the temple built? Give the size of the temple. Describe the parts of the temple. From what place was the ark of the covenant taken? What did Solomon say to the people before he prayed, For what did he pray?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—The temple dedicated.
I. Divine acceptance symbolized.
II. Pardon for all men contemplated

I. Divine acceptance symbolized. The primary design of the temple at Jerusalem was to afford a habitation for the ark of the covenant and for him whose covenant it contained. It was the meeting place for God and man, the place of intercession and atonement. The supreme moment in the history of the sacred building came when the cloud which symbolized the assured presence of Jehovah, filled the house. It testified to God's acceptance of the temple and its services. It proclaimed his readiness to hear prayer. It inspired and confirmed faith. It restored significance to old symbols. It introduced a supernatural element. It afforded to the minds of all a visible image and the glorious appearance of God's having descended into this temple to make it his dwelling-place. It betokened the divine approval upon Israel in their purpose to exalt his name before all nations and to observe to do all things according to his law. The appearance of the cloud was the most important event of the day. The abiding presence of Jehovah in Israel was the most significant proof of their well-being. The consecration of the temple was the grandest religious ceremony of the old covenant. In it, Solomon, as the king chosen of God, represented the entire theocracy. He was one in heart and interest with those over whom he ruled. He did not take to himself the whole credit for originating the design of the temple. He ascribed to David, his father, the ideal which had become the accomplished work of his son. God's covenant with David brought to Solomon much of his glory and honor. David had been the military hero and champion of his nation. Solomon was to be the organizer and administrator. Never did Solomon appear so much "in all his glory," as on the day of the dedication of the temple. He was fully alive to the solemn and momentous meaning of what was taking place on that day.

II. Pardon for all men contemplated. Solomon's chief desire was that all people might know the Lord. Israel's mission was to make known to mankind the God who had revealed himself in wondrous power to them. The whole Mosaic economy was built on the grand truth of the absolute world-wide supremacy of Jehovah. Solomon's conception of the personality and power of God was sublime. Throughout his prayer, he identified the house of God with all human interests. He spread before God the needs of all people, and asked from him deliverance in every time of need. He enumerated specific cases in which the merciful interposition of God would be required. He recognized distinctly the fact that all things which had ever occurred to try the faith, the patience, the virtue of mankind would occur again and again. He entered into various supposed conditions of need and suffering among his people as a true intercessor in their behalf. Sincere piety, blended with deepest humility. His royalty assumed the aspect of fatherhood. The praying king was one of the most remarkable features in the scene of the dedication of the temple. He was the central figure. Both priest and prophet gave place to him. His supplication took a wider range than the needs of Israel alone. Kindly human sympathy was a marked characteristic of Solomon's prayer. It overflowed national prejudice. Simple, touching and beautiful were the words of that first prayer offered in the temple. Forgiveness was the first thing asked for. Solomon regarded it as most needed, most important. The Hebrew King might not sacrifice or burn incense, but he might lead the prayers both of priests and people on that grandest day in the history of Israel. He prayed as the representative and leader of others. All through that prayer, which stands so prominent in scripture and remarkable in circumstances, reference was made to sin and to the consequent necessity for pardon, since sin is ever the cause of disquietude. It is the moral disease that lurks within the human soul. The relation of the temple to the individual religious life of the people was clearly brought to view. Before the mercy seat, all suppliants stood on one common level, subject to the same dangers and necessities. On that basis Solomon's intercession was acceptable to God. T. R. A.

P.S.—According to Lord Kitchener, the big war has only begun.

"The War Summary"

Almost from the very day the great European war began in August last the outstanding feature in Canadian journalism covering the conflict has been "The War Summary" daily on pages 1 and 2 of THE GLOBE. In the concisest possible form the writer has given his readers a pen picture of the developments in all parts of the world. While the details of the movements along the extended frontiers have not been overlooked, the readers of THE GLOBE have been enabled to follow intelligently and with confidence the general outlines of the stupendous conflict. "The War Summary" of THE GLOBE is reproduced daily by several papers throughout the Dominion.

The Editorial Page

THE GLOBE on its editorial page has striven to place before the public in proper perspective the broad background of the titanic struggle. This series of articles has attracted the attention not only of the Canadian people, but of leading men and journals in all parts of the world. The causes leading up to the war, the elements entering into its conduct, and the results likely to flow from the cessation of hostilities have been dealt with in that bold and clear-cut form characteristic of THE GLOBE's editorial page.

News Service

The above features, in addition to a cable and letter service from the front unexcelled in Canada, have placed THE GLOBE far in the lead of Canadian papers and partly explain the phenomenal increase of 33 1-3 per cent in THE GLOBE's circulation during recent months.

Other Features

The sporting pages, the financial and commercial pages, the woman's pages, etc., etc., with the additional pages in Wednesday's issue devoted to "Farm and Country Life," are maintained at a high standard of excellence, a standard that has justified THE GLOBE in its title of Canada's National Newspaper, and has given it by many thousands the largest circulation of any morning paper in the Dominion.

Local and City Papers

By all means take your local paper, but in the field of metropolitan newspapers THE GLOBE unquestionably offers you the greatest value to be had in Canada. Order it to-day. 25 cents per month—one dollar for four months—three dollars per year.

GERMANY'S REAL OBJECTIVE

In his pursuit of the phantasm of world domination the Kaiser's principal objective was not westward but eastward. It was a necessary step towards the achievement of his purpose that the Triple Entente powers should be crushed and the German war party all along recognized that the main enemy was England. But they never believed that Germany would have to fight at one time the three powers which composed the Entente. They saw, in imagination that Britain was a decadent power from whose nerveless hand the sceptre of Empire was dropping, and they were determined to seize it. The crushing of France and Russia they deemed to be easy, and that once accomplished they would have the resources of Europe at their command, with which to challenge and overcome British supremacy on sea. This German hatred of "England"—always "England"—is no new thing, although it has been raised to white heat by the course of the war. That hate is old as the moment when the toast of "The Day" was first heard in the mess-rooms of the German army.

THE MANITOBA ELECTIONS

The date for the Provincial elections in the province of Manitoba has been set for Thursday August, 6th, and the question is being asked "How will the province go?" Grafting has been prevalent in the Manitoba House for years, but the unscrupulous electors, having seemingly closed their eyes and plugged their ears, persisted in voting Tory and returning a Conservative Legislature to power by a large majority. In this instance, however, the circumstances are somewhat altered. The Conservative Government eventually collapsed and resigned in a body. The investigation commission has since revealed grafting to such an extent that the electors who sent the late government to Winnipeg should blush with shame for having done so, and the honest man can surely not vote Conservative at the approaching election in Manitoba without feeling a cringe of conscience. These graft exposures should be the means of turning the tide and ousting from power the corrupt Conservative government which has so long been in power and returning a clean Liberal legislature on August 6th to make the laws of the land.

The Conservative party realizing the situation have added many new planks to their platform, and in an endeavor to hold the vote of the people, are "out for Total Prohibition; women suffrage, abolition of the patronage system; total elimination of spoils in civil service, etc, etc, etc." They are the old, old promises, however, and the Conservative candidates and orators will become somewhat fatigued, before they can convince the electors that they will fulfill their promises, of twentieth century reform if returned to power.

21,770,000 Men Fighting.

In justification of the superlative adjectives that are applied to the present war, William Michaelis has compiled figures in Over Land and Sea, showing just how big the war is. He estimates that 21,770,000 men stand opposed to each other—12,820,000 on the side of the allies and 8,950,000 for Germany, Austria, and Turkey. On the naval side, his estimates are as follows:

	Allies.	Germany et al
Line ships	113	52
Big cruisers	87	17
Small cruisers	128	56
Torpedo boats	701	358
Submarines	179	x10
Miscellaneous	231	139

(x Number new boats unknown.)

The area of the countries ranged against Germany, exclusive of Italy, he finds to be 67,0[illegible] square kilometres, with an aggregate population of 800,[illegible] Germany and her allies, on the other hand, have a territory of [illegible] square kilometres, and a population of [illegible] persons. The daily cost of the war to the ten nations now taking part he places at 109,000,000 marks ($12,250,000), and he estimates that up to the first of April the total cost of the war was 10,000,000 marks ([illegible]). Italy again excepted, he placed the annual cost of such a war at $46,000,000,000.

Come on, you defamers of God and enemies of His church! Come on, you bull-necked, beetle-browed, hog-jowled, peanut brained, weazel-eyed, four-flushers, false-alarms and excess baggage! In the name of almighty God, I challenge and defy you. I'm here nine weeks. Come on, and I'll deliver the goods, express prepaid! Oh get right with God! If you do, the devil will bank his fires, hell will be for rent and its boss in the hospital by the Fourth of July. Churches today are mere social organizations. We want more of God and less of dress, show and money. Card-playing, drink-guzzlin', gin-fizzlin' and tangoin' cast out no devils, my friends. Some preachers are pretty good fellows, but they can't hit the ball. I've got a gospel gun that shoots straight. It's loaded with rough on rats, ipeca, rock salt, dynamite and barbed wire. I could get off a line of talk that would make a Greek professor's jaws squeak, but I doped out long ago that the people don't want that line of conversation.—Billy Sunday quoted in The Christian Standard.

Let the Family Starve

With enough money buried in the cellar to buy square meals for many and many a year, the wife and child of Fred Hedge of Garrie were found to be starving to death. They had been living on the charity of their nearby neighbors and when found were in a state of collapse from lack of food. The constable found buried in the cellar a large amount of perfectly good currency, which the husband had hoarded up and buried.

Kicked by Horse.

Greta Hunter, a daughter of Mrs. George Hunter, Russell st. is the victim of an unfortunate accident. Miss Hunter with some companions were crossing a field in the rear of her home in which a mare and her foal were grazing. Her proximity to the foal apparently aroused the mother's anger and she launched out with her hind legs striking the girl in the face, inflicting wounds of a painful although not necessarily severe nature.—Kincardine Review.

No Chance There

At a social affair some time since the subject of marriage came up for discussion. "Speaking of marriage," remarked one of the women guests, "I could never quite understand one of the Biblical references to it." "To which one do you particularly refer, Mrs. Jones?" asked another of the guests. "About marrying in Heaven" answered Mrs. Jones, thoughtfully. "Why do you suppose there is no marrying nor giving in marriage in Heaven?" "That's an easy one," promptly chipped in a sarcastic matron "I don't suppose there is a man in the place."

Had Booze in Trunk.

A despatch from Durham on Saturday says:— At a trial held here Saturday morning before Justices of the [illegible] Holden of town, and Melvin [illegible] of Holstein, Mrs. J. C. Nichol, proprietress of the Middaugh House, was fined $300 and costs for illegally having liquor on the premises. Crown Attorney Dyre of Owen Sound, appeared for the prosecution, and Barrister Klein of Walkerton for the defendant. Three weeks ago Constable Arrowsmith seized a trunk, of which he had become suspicious, after its delivery at the Middaugh House from the C.P.R. station. It was very heavy and after having it conveyed to his residence, not being able to secure a key that would unlock it, he broke it open. Two kegs well packed in were revealed, one of gin and the other good Scotch, each containing eight or ten gallons. Following this discovery the case was entered.

15,000 at Owen Sound; One Drunk.

The Owen Sound Times is to hand this week with a heading across the entire front page, "Yesterday's Twelfth of July the Biggest in Owen Sound," and the story of the doings of big day concludes with the following paragraph which speaks well for local option. Considering the size of the crowd it was most sisterly. The absence of intoxicated men upon the street was remarkable. The police took only one and had only one call during the day. So far the Times reporter has spoken to only one citizen who saw more than a single drunk and that one averred that he saw two. This is something worthy of note. Imagine in the old days when the bars were open a crowd of 15,000 with hardly a case of intoxication. If any vindication of the dry town is needed it was afforded in most unstinted measure at yesterday's celebration. no more roistering night gangs! No unplesentness for ladies on the street! By nine o'clock the streets were quite normal, just town people about as usual.

Autos Collide

On the evening of Dominion Day two cars met in the centre of the road at Rae's bridge, with the inevitable result in such cases—injury to property and danger to life. Mr. Brown Cargill was the only person hurt, his back being strained so that he was laid up for several days. He was driving his own car at the time. The other was a Paisley machine which stood the racking better, but both were subjects for treatment in the repair shop.—Advocate.

A Gallon of Gasoline.

A single gallon of gasoline will do wonders almost anywhere, but nowhere has it been applied to better purpose than on the farm. Here are some of its stunts. It will milk 300 cows, bale four tons of hay, mix thirty-five yards of cement, move a ton truck fourteen miles, plow three-fifths of an acre of land and make enough electricity to keep eight lights going in the farmhouse for thirty days. Goodby to boyhood memories of turning the grindstone.—Wall Street Journal.

Insane Man Attempts to Escape

Mr Herbert Strong of Lion's Head who has been acting strangely for some time has been pronounced insane and on Monday was taken to Walkerton jail prior to being sent to the asylum. When Strong, along with two constables who had charge of him arrived at Tara on the early train, he made a break for liberty, jumped the train and ran down the street. He was soon captured, however, and taken to his destination by automobile. Strong was a former resident of Tara and has a wife and children residing in Lion's Head.—Tara Leader.

Division Court.

Judge Gregg, the newly-appointed junior judge of Bruce, held his first court in Chesley on Tuesday. The new appointee looks more like a clergyman than a legal man. He is 68 years old and if he does not get through his work as speedily as Judge Klein he will become faster with practice. Only two cases of importance came before him. Hugh Watt of Chesley was sued for wages by Jno. Beckler of Scone. Judgement was given for Beckler for $12 more than Watt had offered to settle for and had paid into the court. The decision of Magistrate Montgomery in the Paulin case was reversed His Honor held that it had not been established that Paulin was driving at an immoderate speed nor that he was the driver. The town of Chesley will have to pay the costs of both the magistrate's and Division Court. C. J. Mickle for the town and O. E. Klein for Paulin.—Chesley Enterprise.

Full of Trouble

The itinerant system of the Methodist church has borne away from this district two pastors who must have a peculiar bond of sympathy. It will be remembered that a little over a year ago, while the provincial general elections were pending, the London Conference passed a strong resolution on the Rowell temperance policy. One of the two ministers to whom we refer, deeming it incumbent upon him to carry out the instructions of the Conference by pointing out the duty of the voters on his circuit, preached strongly along this line and in consequence incurred the ill-will of some members of his flock whose political prejudices were touched on the raw. The Methodist minister of the neighboring circuit, sizing up the situation decided it would be better not to give his people any advice from the pulpit as to how they should vote and because he did not do so he fell from grace in the eyes of some members of his congregation. We don't know that we can draw any moral from this double incident, except once more to recognize the fact that this world is full of trouble.—Goderich Signal.

At the baseball game played Friday in Harriston between Palmerston and Mount Forest, third baseman Bateman of Mount Forest fell while running, and received a compound fracture of his left arm.

Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Best, Ottawa, who have been on a motor trip to Western Ontario were on Sunday the guests of Mrs. Best's sister, Mrs James Giles They were accompanied by another sister Mrs. McKay and her son and daughter, Mr. and Miss Teviotdale. The party also called on the editor of the Confederate to renew and acquaintance made with Mr. an Mrs [illegible] thirty years ago in Walkerton.—Mount Forest Confederate.

Young Pastor Appreciated

Rev. J W. Stewart who has been filling one of the Toronto Methodist church pulpits for the past two years, has been appointed pastor of the Drew congregation and began work in his new field this month. Before leaving New Toronto he was presented with a beautiful clock, accompanied by an address from the Ladies' Aid. Mr. Stewart is a son of Mr. and Mrs. W.T. Stewart of Greenock.

All She Needed

A Scotchman who resided at the foot of a hill had the cow, but was rather short of grass for her. The honest man, not knowing what to do with the cow, tethered her on the top of the hill, where she got little or nothing to eat but heather. A neighbor on seeing this remarked to the crofter: "Och, yer cow has naething tae eat on the top o' the hill." "She has nae muckle to eat, but she has a gran' view," was the reply.

Shooting Accident

Mr. Angus Mclanis of 10th con Bruce had his arm punctured by a small bullet on Friday evening of last week while in Paisley He had been doing some carpenter work for Mr. John Stoddart and met with the mishap while coming out of the latter's house from supper. The bullet was discharged from a 22 cal rifle in the hands of Mr. P. D. Kennedy who was sniping at sparrows from the back window of his harness shop. Mr. Kennedy is very much distressed as a result of the accident.—Advocate

Wingham Man Killed.

Mrs. William Aitcheson, of Wingham, received word on Monday of the death of her son, Laughlin, who died of wounds received while fighting in France. A comrade had been wounded and Aitcheson went to his assistance, when a shrapnel shell burst over him. A fragment struck him in the back injuring the spine so that the lower power of his body was paralyzed. He was taken to an hospital where he underwent several operations, but these were without avail. Young Aitcheson is very highly spoken of about Wingham, where he grew to manhood. He will be greatly missed by many friends and his widowed mother.

Give Your Old Razor.

In many homes in town and country there is one or more old razors lying about unused and absolutely worthless to the owner. Cutlers Hall, Sheffield, England, has undertaken to collect these old razors, fit them up and send them to the soldiers in the camps or at the front. They are doing this collecting and fitting up free of charge and the razors will not cost either the War Department or the soldier anything. This collection campaign is extended to Canada and Thos. B. Lee, 30 Front St., East, Toronto, is the medium through which razors collected in Ontario will be forwarded. Locally S. W. Vogan & Son or Bremner's Fair will be pleased etc receive old razors which the owners may wish to donate. Don't think the old blade is no good because you have failed to make it work. A little fitting up by an expert may transform it into a very serviceable article.

Soldier and Tobacco

Surely there can be no truth in the report that the Methodist Conference has passed a resolution to prohibit the sending of tobacco to the soldiers at the front. There must be a mistake somewhere. If not, I say, shame on Methodism, and I am sure that all liberal minded men and women will say the same. When a murderer is condemned to die, I am told the orders are given that he is to have everything he wishes for his last breakfast. Are our brave boys at the front then of less account than a common criminal that they are be denied the privilege of a pipeful of tobacco before out fight and die for their country? God knows the poor boys have it hard enough without having any of their few comforts and privileges denied them by the very people they are giving their lives to protect. I am not and never have been a smoker, but if a pipeful of tobacco or even a cigarette is any help or comfort to one of the boys in the trenches, in the name of mercy let him have it. As to the non-smokers, why should tobacco in the trenches be more of a temptation than it is when they see it on all sides of them in their home towns? I have been a member of the Methodist church for years but I cannot understand how anyone can uphold and approve such a resolution.—A Methodist.—From the Tara Leader.

In Columbia Double-Disc Records is due the PATENTED and EXCLUSIVE COLUMBIA PROCESS of MANUFACTURE

Columbia Records are BUILT-UP. Instead of economising and using one mixture for the whole record. Columbia Records are made in THREE LAYERS, using the cheaper material in the centre only where it doesn't count in the reproduction. The best and most expensive material the world can provide is used on the outer surfaces on which the sound wave or music is engraved.

THAT'S WHY COLUMBIA RECORDS SOUND BETTER AND WEAR LONGER

—the same difference in value as there is between an ordinary pine and an expensive built-up oak door.

All Columbia records are double, a different selection on each side.

And yet these records cost you less money than any others.

You are not getting the utmost value for your money or the best out of your machine—no matter of what make—unless you use Columbia records.

FARMERS!
Why Metallic Roofing and Shingles are not as durable as "Brantford Slates"

Brantford Asphalt Slates
For Houses and Barns

We are making colored and plain Asphalt Slates suitable for roofing any class of building, particularly farmers' buildings.

SPECIAL OFFER We are making a special offer to roof the first house or barn in your locality at almost cost price and guarantee it's lifetime for ten years against leakage.

Electricians will tell you that Asphalt, from which Brantford Asphalt Shingles are made, is an excellent insulating material, and does not deteriorate when exposed to the elements, being proof against acid, salt, alkali, rust and corrosion.

Galvanized Iron is subject to all these agents of destruction, as well as other enemies, viz., rust and moisture from the inside of the barn, produced by the heating of grain, moisture from cattle, etc. It is also open to attacks from the elements without, and both processes are working toward its ruin at the same time. In other words, condensation is causing the destruction of Metal Roofing and Shingles, while Asphalt Slates retain their wearing qualities indefinitely.

Therefore, Asphalt Slates are, in the end, the cheapest roofing material you can buy, and, as they are now made, the most attractive in appearance, as well as being waterproof and practically fireproof.

LOW PRICES We have succeeded in producing them at about the same price as wood shingles. Let us figure with you at once.

There is no reason why the farmers of our country should put up with leaky roofs when we have acres of material we can supply quickly, at moderate prices.

ROOF-LEAK PAINTS (in Red, Green and Black) This splendid material is especially adapted for old Shingles and Metal and Felt Roofing of all kinds. In fact, any material that will take paint, can be made to last years longer by an application. Put up in large open-mouth cans of 1, 2, 3 and 5 gallons.

TO STUDY FOOD PRICES.

A Board of Trade Departmental Committee has been appointed to consider what steps should be taken by legislation or otherwise to maintain and if possible increase the production of food in England and Wales on the assumption that the war may be prolonged beyond the harvest of 1916.

Lord Milner is chairman of the committee.

The committee has been asked, should it find that additional powers are necessary, to report in time for legislation to be submitted to Parliament during the present session.

The following table of the average prices paid by the working classes for food on March 1 and June 1 is furnished by the President of the Board of Trade. It is compiled from the figures in 80 of the principal towns of the United Kingdom:

	March s. d.	June s. d.

A HUSKY REGIMENT.

The 19th Middlesex, the second of the two navvy battalions raised by Colonel John Ward, M. P., occupies a racecourse near London. Some of the men are quartered comfortably at the racecourse stables and loose boxes that have been turned into barracks; the remainder are in no less comfortable tents of a new pattern; the officers luxuriate in a grand stand all to themselves.

It is a hefty regiment, this of the navvies. The "mascot" of the regiment is a private, who, to all appearance, weighs sixteen stone, all of it brawn and muscle. The officially admitted average weight of officers and men is twelve stone. Colonel Ward himself is Britain's Samson M. P.; his adjutant is a man such as Caesar loved, and some of his officers might crush a Hun salient by a mass movement of their own. But it is, of course, only coincidence that the legend "Weighing Room" still remains on a door in the officers' quarters.

The men of this regiment of Anaks are nearly all navvies and miners. Scots, Geordie, and Yorkshire mix with purest Cockney in the camp tongue. There is tremendous keenness among the men. Most of them are in their thirties, many of them nomads of toil who have never knuckled down to long routine in their lives. Men of this age and stamp do not take readily to the monotony of drill. "But," said an officer, "you can hear a pin drop when you explain to them the bearing of drill on the work they will have to do at the front."

Agriculturists in almost every part of the country are perturbed at the drought. Its ill effects on all kinds of vegetation are being intensified by great sun heat and drying winds.

Only Kent, Sussex, and the southwestern counties have had any useful rainfall since the generally heavy downpour of May 17 and 18.

Over the country generally ponds are drying up and springs diminishing. The roads are inches deep in dust, and the soiled appearance of vegetation anywhere near a road robbed "leafy June" of one of its chief charms.

TRACTION ENGINE RACE.

An amusing story is told at Dover of three sailors who, after visiting a district outside the Dover liquor restriction area, commandeered a traction engine, which had been left unattended, to ride back to Dover.

One, a stoker, got up steam and raced the engine at full speed through two villages. The engine swayed dangerously and was eventually stopped by a constable, who ran by the side until he was able to get aboard.

THE KING AND A D. C. M. HERO.

The King secured three days' leave of absence from the trenches for Lance-Corporal Charles Bennett, 3rd Hussars, an old boy of the London County School at Mayford, Woking, who recently gained the Distinguished Conduct Medal.

The present head boy wrote to the King and asked if Bennett might be allowed to come from Flanders and receive the school's congratulations and gift at the annual inspection and prize-giving on Saturday.

THE KING AND HERO FAMILY.

Learning of the death at the front of three of the four soldier sons of Mr. George Shallis, 10, Ranelagh-road, Harlesden, London, the King sent a letter of sympathy to the father, who himself is serving with the National Reserve.

In the letter the King said that he regarded "with especial satisfaction the spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion to duty which prompted so many in one family to give their lives for their sovereign and country."

PICTURE ROBBERY.

Thieves broke into the Marlborough Galleries, Duke street, London, and cut from their frames a number of pictures valued at £3,500.

The police description of the stolen paintings is as follows:

Portrait of a lady, by Lawrence, 30 in. by 25 in.

Small exterior, by Watteau, 14½ in. by 11½ in.

Cottage door, by Gainsborough, 29 in. by 90 in.

Portrait of a lady, dog in lap, by Hoppner, 40 in. by 34 in.

MORE "FRIGHTFULNESS."

A cartridge belt from a German machine gun was picked up by one of our men in the Ypres area while he was working in the dark. The lead of several cartridges in the belt had been reversed, so that the broad base struck the objective. The injuries thus caused are frightful.

A stream of water in the same area which runs from the German trenches into ours was found to be poisoned. A warning notice has been erected by it.

"GLASS HOUSE" FIRE

High Cross House, which stood several hundred feet above Lake Windermere, was gutted by fire. It was locally known as the "Glass House," and the outbreak is attributed to the heat of the sun's rays.

NOTES.

Bradford College boys have volunteered to make shells for the Government, and to devote part of their holidays to the work, which will begin almost directly.

When Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Dutton, of Wyngurth, Stanley drive, Roundhay, Leeds, entered their house on Saturday afternoon, last week, after an absence of six hours, they found their son, Edmund Lionel, aged 21, lying in one of the rooms with a bullet wound apparently inflicted with a revolver.

Police-Inspector Button, Chesterfield, has 21 relatives in the army—20 serving in France and one training in England.

Sergeant R. Heaton, a Ripley lad, who has been twice wounded, has secured a commission in his regiment, the King's Liverpool, 7th Battalion.

The great dearth of working class housing accommodation at Chesterfield is illustrated by a notice posted outside a well-known estate agent's offices, which runs, "No cottage property to let."

A fatal accident occurred at Glapwell Colliery, a pony driver named George William Shelton, 16, of 23 Glumangate, Chesterfield, being buried by a fall of roof, and killed almost instantaneously. Another man, Henry Bradshaw, was injured.

Last week 121 recruits were accepted in Nottingham. No fewer than 21 men joined the R. E. from the Nottingham Post Office last week.

A workman who was fined at Jarrow for drunkenness was stated to have worked 39½ hours last week.

A soldier named David Wilson was sentenced to 12 years' penal servitude at Glasgow on Tuesday. He struck his wife with a brush, and she died within a few minutes.

For absenting himself from Messrs. Cammell, Laird & Co.'s Sheffield works without notice, William Bradshaw, a puller-out at a crucible steel furnace, was ordered to pay £2 10s damages. A whole set of men had to stop work because of the defendant's absence. His excuse was that the job was too heavy for a man of 50.

Four Codnor Park men were at Ripley, on Monday, charged with absenting themselves from the Codnor Park Iron and Steel Works without notice, and nominal damages of £2 were claimed. A fine of £2 and costs was imposed in the cases of John Southall and Robert Carlile, and George Oldham and Albert Baker were fined £1 and costs each.

Lord Rosebery, hon. colonel of the 7th Royal Scots, Leith, has sent £50 as a donation to the Leith Memorial Fund in connection with the troop train disaster.

Dr. J. Esmond (Nationalist), with 1,633 votes, was returned for North Tipperary, Mr. Hector's figures being 1,357 and Mr. Gill's 1,192.

Mr. J. D. Hope, M. P. for Haddingtonshire, has been laid up, suffering from appendicitis. His condition, however, is much improved, and he expects shortly to resume his Parliamentary duties.

Private Michael Goffrey another victim of Gretna railway disaster, died a week ago Tuesday night at Carlisle.

Three Chester magistrates are working during their spare hours producing munitions of war.

Whilst joking with a customer, Mr. R. J. Stanton, a North London publican, was seized with apoplexy and died with the world on his lips.

Coinciding with the centenary of Waterloo, the St. Helena Signal Book, an interesting relic of Napoleon's exile, was sold at Sotheby's for £41.

Damage estimated at £6,000 or £7,000 was caused by a fire which broke out at Messrs. Payne's pianoforte factory in Fortess road, Kentish Town.

Every man wounded in the war who has applied to join the Corps of Commissionaires has been found employment, says Major F. E. Walter in his annual report.

The Manchester and District Master Bakers' Association has decided to increase the weight of bread without further cost to the purchaser by 2 oz. per loaf all round.

Mr. Acland states in Parliamentary papers that the Board of Agriculture see no reason at present to anticipate a shortage of wheat during the coming autumn.

The military authorities have promulgated an order that soldiers in Carmarthen are not to be supplied with intoxicants by licensees except between 1 p.m. and 2 p.m., and between 6.30 and 9 in the evening.

A house-to-house penny collection throughout Shropshire, organized by Mr. W. C. Bridgeman, M.P., resulted in nearly £2,000 being raised for the St. John Ambulance Association and the British Red Cross Society.

Mr. Horatio George Wright, skipper of the steam trawler Eileen Emma, of Lowestoft, in recognition of his services to the shipwrecked crew and passengers of the steamship Falaba, of Liverpool, sunk in St. George's Channel on March 28, has been awarded a piece of plate by the Board of Trade.

Sixteen hundred Welsh miners are reported to be on strike at Tonyrefail on the non-unionist question.

Northumberland coal owners and miners met at Newcastle with regard to the proposed suspension of the Eight-Hour Act, and after a brief discussion adjourned pending the holding of the national conferences.

The Rev. H. W. King, of the Church of Our Father, Rotherham, has resigned, having accepted a pastorate at Lincoln.

The Rev. W. Stewart, of St. Mary's, Chester, has been the recipient of a silver salver and cheque from parishioners and friends on his departure to take up the living of Barton-Hartshorn and Chetwode, near Buckingham. Mrs. Stewart received a gold watch bracelet.

The Rev. William Hareus, M.A., who for many years was minister of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Sheffield, has been appointed to take charge of Durham Presbyterian Church during the absence of the pastor, Rev. A. R. Paton, on military service.

Captain John Graham, the famous golfer who was serving in the Liverpool Scottish, is reported to have been killed at the front.

News reached Liverpool of the death of Mr. John Holt, head of the firm of John Holt & Co., West African merchants, Liverpool, at the age of 75.

The death has taken place at Thurlstone, near Penistone, of Mr. Mark Beever, formerly of Top of Town Farm. Deceased, who was in his 72nd year, was a well-known farmer in the district.

"Donegal has the unpleasant pre-eminence of being the county in Ireland which up to the present from all sections have returned the fewest number of recruits," said Judge Cooke to a grand jury at Lifford crown sessions, County Donegal. "Of 21,000 men of recruitable age in the county, less than 300 have joined the colors since the beginning of the war."

Starting life as a pit boy at Tipton, Staffs, and working later as a puddler in Messrs. Cammell's works, Parkgate, Sheffield, Mr. James Duffiel, Tallintire Hall, Cockermouth, Cumberland, 82, who died recently, left £151,734. He was successively manager of the Dronfield Iron Works and of the Workington Iron Works. He was the inventor of compound armor.

Ten soldiers and six other passengers were injured while travelling in a motor-omnibus which, when south of Gateshead, Durham, was struck by a motor-car, ran over a wall, and fell on its side in a field.

The trawler St. Denis, which recently arrived at Hull from Iceland, has realized £2,175 from its catch of fish. Away for sixteen days, the St. Denis therefore took £135 18s. 9d. worth of fish each day.

Two degrees of frost were registered early on Monday morning, June 21, and four on Sunday in Lincolnshire. The damage was most severe in the Spalding, Boston and Holbeach districts. Whole fields of potatoes have been blackened. Growers interviewed on Monday could not remember such heavy destruction at so late a period of any previous season. They state that the long spell of drought has rendered crops especially susceptible to frost.

A motor-car at Lincoln displaced the elaborate stage coach, with bewigged driver and footmen, hitherto used by the judges in driving to the assize courts. Gone also were the trumpeters with their beflagged instruments. The new order of things is approved by the Privy Council during the continuance of the war.

From a Metropolitan police constable to a captain in the famous "Diehards" (Middlesex Regiment, 4th-8th) is eight months is the record of Mr. Arthur Gray, of Teddington. When war broke out he was a constable in the "T" division at Teddington. He joined the Royal Fusiliers, and in view of his South African experience in the Rifle Brigade soon became an efficient sergeant. Further promotion in the non-commissioned ranks followed, and now he has been made lieutenant and temporary captain.

On leaving Norwich for London on Sunday night week, Coy.-Sergt.-Major Daniels, V. C., was presented with a purse of gold and given an enthusiastic, hearty send-off. Daniels and his wife in a brougham were pulled by soldiers along the principal streets to Thorpe station, the populace cheering the hero lustily.

Three hundred Nottingham children whose schools have been requisitioned for the wounded are to be taught during the summer in a camp school at the Arboretum public park. Six marquees, with wooden floors, will house the scholars. Nature study will be a feature of the curriculum, and when the weather is suitable the children will be taught in the open air.

The Queen visited the wounded soldiers at the Palace Hotel Hospital, Southend, on Wednesday last week. She was received at the hospital by the Mayor of Southend and Dr. Hall White on behalf fo the committee of management. There were 190 patients in the hospital.

WINDS THAT WHISTLE.

The Sounds Come Only When the Air Waves Meet Resistance.

Did you ever notice that although you may feel the force of the wind when you are out in it, you do not hear it whistle unless you are close to a building? This is because the sound is produced according to the same principles as apply to the production of the tones of a pipe organ or any instrument on which the tones are produced by blowing.

In order to make the whistling sounds we hear from the wind it is necessary for it to blow against something. That is why we hear it when we are in the house or some other building.

The whistling is caused by the wind blowing past the sharp edge of some obstacle in its path or finding its way through small openings offering some sharp edged resistance.

If you blow through a long tube or pipe you will produce no sound, but if there is an opening with a sharp edge near the end where you blow the blowing will cause a distinct sound. It is on this principle that all small whistles, organ pipes and wind instruments of an orchestra are made.

Another way in which the wind produces sounds is by blowing against objects which vibrate. A curious instance of this is the humming volume of sound produced by the wind blowing through a group of telegraph wires, and which may be noted, even when there is not a great force of wind, by placing the ear against a telegraph pole.—Boston Herald.

The Golden Fleece.

The noted Order of the Golden Fleece is a military one instituted by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, in 1429, on the occasion of his marriage with the Portuguese Princess Isabella. The order now belongs to both Spain and Austria.

FELT HAT IN LIGHT SHADE FOR SUMMER WEAR.

Though felt hats for some time past have been scarce, they are undoubtedly popular at the present time. Not only sport types, but also the more dressy effects are shown. Trimmed sailors, as illustrated, wide flopping brims with flower or ribbon trimmings, are very smart. These summer felts come in all light attractive shades, and are very new and practical.

WET AND DRY

Progress of Prohibition in the United States.

Figures on the wet and dry situation through the United States, as of January 1, 1915, have been collected by the temperance society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which has its headquarters in Topeka, Kan. The society says that this material "was obtained after persistent correspondence with all sources of information in the various states." In the case of some few states this correspondence has not been wholly satisfactory, the society admits, but it asserts that the greatest care has been taken to make its statements absolutely reliable.

Alabama—Eight wet counties and 59 dry. There were no elections during the past year.

Arizona—Voted for prohibition November 3, 1914. Law went into effect January 1, 1915. Majority about 3,500.

Arkansas—Automatically becomes dry each January 1st under the Going law, which requires consent of a majority of all white adult men and women before a license can be granted in any unit. On December 31st, 1914, 45 counties had wet spots and 49 were dry.

California—One hundred forty-seven supervisorial districts are dry and 123 wet. Eighteen counties are entirely dry, outside of incorporated towns, and only 10 are entirely wet. There are 38 dry incorporated cities and towns. Only 2 cities were lost during the past year, and one supervisoral district, while 3 supervisoral districts have been won. California rejected Statewide prohibition by a majority of 165,115 on November 3, 1914.

Colorado—Voted dry, November 3, 1914. Majority, 11,572. Law to go into effect January 1, 1916.

Connecticut—Ninety dry towns, 78 wet. Four elections were won during 1914, and one lost.

Delaware—Two counties dry, one wet. Court decisions have outlawed many drinking clubs.

District of Columbia—The Jones-Works law has reduced the number of saloons to 300 and strict administration of the law will eventually reduce the number to 25.

Florida—Thirty-eight dry counties, 10 wet.

Georgia—Under State-wide prohibition. Law permits the sale of "near-beer."

Idaho—Twenty-one dry counties, 12 wet. Twenty-one cities of 1,000 or more population are dry, and only 12 are wet.

Illinois—Fifty-three totally dry counties, and 59 wet. About 1,100 saloons were voted out in 1914.

Indiana—Sixty-two wet counties, 30 dry. Thirteen elections were won during 1914, and 6 lost. The wets gained 2 saloons and lost 45.

Iowa—Twelve wet counties, 79 dry; 8 other counties with only one town having saloons.

Kansas—State-wide prohibition excellently enforced. Candidate running on a resubmission platform and polling full strength of wets in the election November 3, 1914, got only nine per cent. of the vote.

Kentucky—One hundred six counties dry, only 11 wet. Seven of the latter have saloons in but two places. No territory has been lost in Kentucky in more than three years. Of 15 wet counties voting in 1914, nine voted dry.

Louisiana—Thirty wet parishes, 31 dry. An election won in 1914, none lost.

Maine—State-wide prohibition; no legislative change in 1914.

Maryland—Ten dry counties, 5 wet. It is believed that state-wide prohibition would carry in Maryland.

Massachusetts—One city carried for no-license. There will be a number of elections in January, February and March.

Michigan—Thirty-four dry counties, 39 wet. Nine out of twelve elections in 1914 were won by the drys; one still in the courts.

Minnesota—Two hundred and sixty-two dry towns out of about 1,200. Forty-four have voted dry during the past year, and only 8 dry towns voted wet. The enforcement by the United States Indian service, Mr. H. A. Larson, special officer, of the Indian treaty made with the Chippewa nation in 1855, closed more than 200 saloons. Six counties are entirely dry.

Mississippi—Under state prohibition. Legislature and courts have materially strengthened the dry policy during the year.

Missouri—Seventy-three dry counties, 18 partially dry, 19 wet. Sixteen elections were won in 1914, 3 lost. The supreme court ruled that all clubs dispensing liquor are saloons and must hold dram shop licenses. This ruling resulted in closing about 2,000 clubs.

Montana—The Indian territory, including the important towns of Polson, Ronan and Dayton, is dry. Corvallis is also dry by action of the people.

Nebraska—Thirty dry counties, 62 wet. Twenty-six elections were won in 1914 and 12 lost.

Nevada—Indian reservation only dry territory.

New Hampshire—Three dry counties, 7 wet. Five towns were won and 5 lost.

New Jersey—No dry counties. One election carried by drys.

New Mexico—One dry county, 25 wet, but most of the territory of the state is dry by precincts and districts. Twenty-one elections have been won during 1914 by the drys and 9 lost.

New York—Two dry counties, 120 dry townships, 200 partly dry townships.

North Carolina—Under state prohibition. Has strong search and seizure law.

North Dakota—Under state prohibition. Enforcement is good and steadily becoming better. Resubmission candidate in Republican primaries got only about 29 per cent. of the vote.

Ohio—Prohibition was defeated at the election of Nov. 3, 1914, and a wet measure enacted.

Oklahoma—Under state prohibition. An amendment to the constitution making drunkenness or the excessive use of intoxicating liquor while in office sufficient cause for impeachment carried in each of the 77 counties.

Oregon—Went for state-wide prohibition on Nov. 3, 1914, by about 36,000 majority. Law will go into effect Jan. 1, 1916. At present Oregon has 5 dry counties and 29 wet.

Pennsylvania—Seven counties are dry by court order.

Rhode Island—Seven dry and 31 wet towns. During the past year one dry town has been added and one lost.

South Carolina—Thirty dry counties, 11 wet. Only one election held, and that won by the drys.

South Dakota—Twenty counties dry, 9 have only one saloon town, and 17 have more than one saloon town. Of the 2,235 incorporated towns where the sale of liquor might be legalized, only 127 places do legalize it. In the no-license elections last spring 35 wet towns voted dry, and 6 dry towns voted wet.

Tennessee—Under state-wide prohibition.

Texas—One hundred and seventy-nine entirely dry counties, 15 partially dry, 22 entirely wet. Seven-eighths of the territory and four-fifths of the population are under prohibition. Three wet counties voted dry in 1914 and 2 dry counties voted wet. Sixteen dry counties voted to remain dry.

Utah—Largely dry.

Vermont—Seventeen wet towns, 229 dry. There are no saloons in 8 out of 14 counties.

Virginia—Voted for prohibition in fall of 1914. Law will go into effect in 1916. Eighty-four counties out of 100 are already dry.

Washington—State voted dry Nov. 3, 1914. Law will take effect Jan. 1, 1916.

West Virginia—Under state-wide prohibition.

Wisconsin—One county entirely dry. Other dry territory covers 25 per cent. of population. Thirty-three incorporated cities and villages and seven townships changed from wet to dry last spring. Only one incorporated village that was dry went wet.

Wyoming—Indian reservation entirely dry, and 25 per cent. of the population lives in saloonless territory.—New York Evening Post.

ROSE COLORED SAILOR.

The sailor, when prettily trimmed, enters the ranks of the garden party hat, and since this shape is invariably favored it has proved very popular. A rather severe shape in a fascinating rose-colored milan is trimmed with a shirred frill of cream net-top lace with dainty embroidered edge, a gracefully draped band and bow of cream moire ribbon, and a modest spray of field flowers in delicate tones.

HAD CHOLERA MORBUS.

SO BAD COULD NOT SIT UP.

Attacks of cholera morbus are caused mostly by indiscretion in diet, the use of unripe fruit and new vegetables, and usually occur during the hot summer months.

On the first sign of this very weakening trouble Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry should be taken.

Mrs. George Lee, Ruthven, Ont., writes: "I was taken with cholera morbus, and I was so bad I could not sit up any more than five minutes at a time. My husband said I looked as if I had been sick a month; he got me a bottle of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, and I took the whole of it in one day, and it completely cured me. We are never without it in the house for I don't think it can be beat."

When you ask for Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry see that you get "Dr. Fowler's," as imitators have gone so far as to imitate our wrapper both in color and style, and have adopted similar names, such as Strawberry Compound, Wild Strawberry Compound, Extract of Strawberry, etc.

"Dr. Fowler's" has been on the market for the past 70 years, and is acknowledged by all who have used it to be a sure cure for all bowel complaints.

Black and White Bathing Suit

In many of the season's latest bathing suits the natural waistline is evident. The circular skirt, too, holds a popular place. Pictured is a black taffeta bathing suit, with circular skirt, showing a narrow pleat fastening. The simple bodice in surplice drape is neatly finished with a hemstitched border. A large white collar, snug hemstitched girdle and satin buttons are interesting features.

Was Troubled With Smothering Spells.

Would Wake Up With Breath All Gone.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills Entirely Cured Her.

Mrs. Wm. McElwain, Temperance Vale, N.B., writes: "I am not much of a believer in medicines, but I must say Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are all right.

Some years ago I was troubled with smothering spells. In the night I would be sound asleep but would waken up with my breath all gone and think I never would get it back. I was telling a friend of my trouble, and he advised me to try Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills. He also gave me a box which I tried, and I had only taken a few of them when I could sleep all night without any trouble. I did not finish the box until some years after when I felt my trouble coming back and I took the rest of them and they entirely cured me."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box or 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

Hard On Crime In Olden Days

To secure as far as possible that no one under the age of 21 years should be found inside a prison through a combination of probation, supervision and Borstal treatment.

This is one of the salient features of the new crimes bill which Mr. McKenna, the Home Secretary, is piloting through Parliament at the present time. This "most Christian crimes bill," as it has been termed, strikingly illustrates the progress we have made in modern times in regard to the consideration and treatment of criminals. It seems almost incredible, indeed, that in the memory of our grandfathers, boys of from twelve to sixteen years of age were whipped, flogged and herded together on hulks, the floating prisons in the Thames.

On these hulks young and old—"criminals, lunatics, feeble-minded and outcasts of all kinds, were cooped up for periods generally varying between one and seven years," says George Ives, in his striking book, "History of Penal Methods."

"About 1824 (according to Mr. Ives) they appear to have placed the boys on a special ship, the hulk Euryalus, and there the youngest 'villain' was nine years old; some of the boys, the inspector reported, 'are so young that they can hardly put on their clothes.'

"Horrible, indeed, was the punishments meted out to young criminals at the beginning of the last century.

"The gallows load was heavy; an instance appeared in a Times paragraph, Jan. 18, 1801, which tells how a certain Andrew Branning, a luckless urchin, aged only thirteen, had broken into a house and carried off a spoon. Others were with him, but they ran away, and only he was captured and brought to trial. His story ended in two words, which were short and customary, 'Guilty—death.'"

There was, however, even in the days when the petty thief was transported for fourteen years for stealing a loaf, and both men and women were flogged in public at the tail of a cart and pilloried and branded for minor offences, a certain humor in the poetic punishments meted out to dishonest tradesmen.

"For instance, a baker who sold loaves which were short of weight, was shown with the bread tied round his neck. A fishmonger, who had been selling bad fish, was paraded with a collar of stinking smelts slung over his shoulder. A grocer who had been selling much adulterated spices was placed in the pillory and had the powders burned beneath his nose."

Reference might also be made to the trial by ordeal in the old days. There was the consecrated barley cake which was supposed to choke a perjurer if he tried to swallow it. A test tried with hot water, in which a stone had to be picked out of boiling liquid without the arm being scalded. Another test consisted of inserting the hand into a glove or hot iron without being burned by it.

The horrors of the transportation system were almost as bad as the terrible punishments of medieval times, and Mr. Ives relates how at each and all of the penal settlements in Australia and New Zealand the prisoners committed desperate assaults, often upon each other by prearrangement, "from absolute weariness of their lives," in order to get away from those dreadful places, if only as witnesses, or even as persons accused of murder.

"At Macquarie Harbor, on one occasion, three prisoners tossed; one was to be slain, another was to strike the fatal blow, the third was to be a witness of the planned deed; so they would get a respite—a grim 'holiday.' At Port Arthur one man murdered his own particular friend and companion, that both might get free from it."

Convicts in those days were not even allowed to sleep properly, and after working on the road and in quarries for ten or twelve hours a day in chains, which weighed from six to seven and sometimes nine pounds, they were herded together in parties of twenty in four strong boxes or chambers built of thick timber.

"So small was the cubic area of these places that the inmates could not all stand or sit together at the same time unless with their legs at right angles to their bodies; often the width of floor on which each could lie was only eighteen inches per prisoner."

Even in this country as late as the 70s, the life of our prisons was so bad that to gain admission to the infirmary, which was well named "the jail paradise," convicts resorted to all manner of desperate devices.

"Irritating colored matter, such as bits of wool or stitches from a garment, were often introduced beneath the skin to set up artificial sores. Powdered glass was sometimes swallowed so as to bring on blood spitting, and not only would convicts horribly maim and mutilate themselves in all manner of ghastly ways, but it is stated that men would often inflict grave injuries on fellow prisoners upon the latter's urgent supplication.

When, too, we remember that the greatest number of lashes it is now possible to inflict upon a prisoner is 36, it is amazing to read that in the early days of Queen Victoria's reign local magistrates were sentencing prisoners to no fewer than 300 lashes. One lad of eighteen received this appalling sentence, but after 75 lashes had been laid on the sufferer apparently collapsed. He died some years afterward while serving a sentence to a penitentiary.

Witches and lunatics were also subjected to terrible treatment. The imputation of sorcery was enough for a death warrant, and it is estimated that during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries 30,000 alleged witches were hounded to death in this country.

There was no proper or humane treatment for lunatics, even royalty being flogged and ill-treated while insane. And one of the most amazing incidents in the history of this country is the manner in which King George III was treated when he became insane.

"His body was immediately inclosed in a machine which left it no liberty of motion. He was sometimes chained to a staple. He was frequently beaten and starved, and at least kept in subjection by menacing and violent language * * * All his troubles were intensified by ill-treatment. They left him to be knocked about by a German servant, and the first doctor kept him even from his own children * * * Such was the orthodox treatment in those days applied against the highest in the land."—Tit-Bits.

A many-sided man ought to be perfectly square.

FARM GARDEN

AN ILL-USED FARMER'S FRIEND.

The skunk is of more value to the farmer than he is apt to be given credit. It stands among the most important animals that choose for their diet insects harmful to the farmer. It is the best-known enemy of army worms, including the common army worm, the wheat-head army worm, and the fall army worm, all of which are destructive to small grains, corn and grasses and cause heavy losses every year to farmers according to the United States Department of Agriculture's biologist.

The skunk, which is represented throughout the country by a number of varieties, genera and species, is an animal of great economic importance. Its food consists very largely of insects, mainly of those species which are very destructive to garden and forage crops. Field observation and laboratory examinations demonstrate that they destroy immense numbers of white grubs, grasshoppers, crickets, cutworms, hornets, wasps and other noxious forms. The alarming increase of the white grub in some localities is largely due to the extermination of this valuable animal.

It is a matter of common observation where white grubs are particularly abundant in cornfields to note little round holes burrowed in the ground about hills of corn. These are made by skunks in their search during the night for these grubs. During an outbreak of grasshoppers in Kansas it was determined that in many cases a large proportion of the food of skunks consisted of these grasshoppers.

Strawberry growers generally regard this animal with favor, even though in its eager search for the grubs it may uproot the plant or eat a few berries. The skunks also eats many mature "May beetles" and "June bugs," which hatch from the white grubs.

Skunks also destroy the hop grub, grasshoppers, cutworms, crickets, sphinx moths, sweet potato beetles, Colorado potato beetles, field mice and rats. The animal is especially useful in destroying the rats and mice that commonly infest farm buildings. If a skunk takes up his residence near premises where these rats are abundant, it will remain there if not disturbed until practically all the rodents are destroyed.

Two kinds of tobacco worms, which also attack tomato and potato plants, are eaten by the skunk in large numbers. These worms change their diet from tobacco to tomatoes with such adaptability that they have spread over wide areas. The skunk's eagerness for the worm is such that he will dig them out from the ground in great numbers in the late summer and destroy them.

Some of the most destructive insects in agriculture are such as do their work below ground and out of reach of any method that the farmer can apply, and it is against many of these that the skunk is an inveterate enemy. Notwithstanding all of this, there is probably not an animal that is ruthlessly slaughtered as is this one, whereas it is entitled to equal protection with, if not more than, some of our birds which enjoy this privilege.

Without doubt an individual skunk occasionally learns to prey upon poultry, and may become a source of great annoyance and loss. If the evidences of its work are unmistakable the animal should be destroyed either by trapping or poisoning. As a matter of fact, minks and weasles, which have not nearly the bad name possessed by their cousin the skunk, are far more bloodthirsty and are expert climbers to roosts, while a common skunk will kill only birds found on the ground. The farmer who loses fowls often mistakes the identity of the animal killing them, and when in doubt often attributes the injury to a skunk.

FARM NEWS AND VIEWS.

To take the pulse of a horse stand on the left side, run the finger along the lower jaw until you come to a point where the artery crosses the jaw on its lower edge. The pulsations may be easily felt here. To get the pulse of a cow stand at the left side; reach over the neck and feel along the right jaw until the artery is found. The normal pulse beat for the horse is 36 to 40 per minute. It may go as high as 100 in cases of disease. In the cow pulsations should count 45 to 50 per minute. A soft pulse, one that is easily compressed by the finger, indicates bronchitis. A hard pulse, one not easily depressed by the finger, indicates inflammation. A hard pulse is often quick, bounding and forceful. An irregular pulse, one that beats fast for a time, then slowly, indicates weakened heart condition. A slow pulse is on that comes up gradually to the finger touch, and indicates some brain trouble.

Good, fresh air in the calf stable is of great importance to the young calf to give it a strong, vigorous constitution and a strong vitality. The calf will be the dairy cow within two years, so if good productive dairy cows are expected the calf needs to be kept strong and thrifty from the start.

Apply intelligent labor to your dairy and watch the income increase.

Thousands of dollars' worth of farm implements rust and rot out every year because no care is given to putting them away properly or protecting them from exposure to the weather. No such show of negligence is found in any other line of business as that of farming.

Oil meal is one of the very best concentrated foods for domestic live stock. It is valuable not only as a highly palatable, nutritious food, but it gives tone to the digestive system and thus aids in the digestion of other feeds. Oil meal has a beneficial effect upon the whole physical economy; it combines food tonic and laxative properties. Ten per cent. of oil meal added to other forms of grain food will improve the general condition of the animal and give to the hair a desirable lustre. It is good for young animals as well as older ones. For dairy cows, which are not fed either alfalfa or vetch hay, or kale, oil meal is almost indispensable for best results. It is also the best substitute for succulent food for the dairy cow. For cows kept in or near towns and cities, where succulent feed is not available, it is invaluable for maintaining a healthful vigor. Oil meal may constitute 10 or 20 per cent. of the grain ration of dairy herds.

The old decaying apple trees in the orchard are veritable breeding places for all sorts of fruit pests. Keep them well chopped out, using them for firewood this winter and replacing them with new, healthy trees.

An especially important point to remember in growing grazing crops for hogs in an orchard is to watch the crop and note when the green matter on the ground is becoming exhausted, and then to take the hogs out of the orchard and avoid the danger of their injuring the trees when the forage crop is gone.

Protein is a feed element which should never be slighted. Protein is present in most feeds, but in quantities too small for proper balance. For successful preparation of live stock for any stock function do not overlook the protein content of feeds. It promotes vigor, builds frame and increases the digestibility of other food. Alfalfa hay contains a considerable proportion of protein, according to our leading article this week. Among other protein feeds may be mentioned oil meal, tankage and the like.

The soils of no two farms are alike—neither are the soils of two fields on the same farm exactly alike. The total plant food in one field differs from that of the adjoining field; the amount of decaying organic matter (humus) differs in different fields; the degree of coarseness or fineness of the soil particles varies greatly; the moisture conditions of no two fields are identical; neither are other physical conditions nor texture of soil exactly alike in two different fields—and so on with an almost infinite number of conditions, each having more or less influence upon the fertility or productivity of the soil, each having its influence upon plant growth.

NERVOUS CHILDREN

Hard Study and Too Little Exercise Leads to St. Vitus Dance.

There is much criticism of modern educational methods that require too much work of school children, allowing them too little time for play and preventing sufficient out-of-door exercise. When the study of music or any other accomplishment, with the necessary practice, is added the strain is increased. Under these conditions the blood becomes impoverished and fails to nourish the nerves. The child becomes restless, and twitching of the muscles follow. Sometimes the child stumbles in walking and drops what it tries to hold. Pallor, listlessness and irritability are symptoms that early show that the blood and nerves are failing to meet the demands made upon them, and then St. Vitus' dance has fastened its hold upon the child.

In this condition there is no tonic can equal Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which build up the blood, strengthen the nerves, and safely help to meet the demands of the growing child. Out-of-door exercise, nourishing food, plenty of sleep with these tonic pills will cure even the most severe cases of St. Vitus' dance. We offer the following proof: "Up to the age of ten years," says Mrs. Johnson, of Hensford, N. B., "my son Calvin was as healthy and rugged as any child could be. Then he began to complain that his eyes hurt him, and of pains in the head, and began to fall back in his studies at school. Then I noticed a twitching of the muscles of his face and arms, and later his whole body seemed to be in constant motion. Our family physician was called in and pronounced the trouble a severe attack of St. Vitus' dance. He was under the doctor's treatment for some three months, but did not seem to improve. We had taken him from school, and were careful that nothing should excite him, but notwithstanding he grew worse, and the least start would bring on attacks of hysteria. This went on for some months until Dr. Williams' Pink Pills were brought to my attention, and we decided to give him that medicine. After using a few boxes there was a noticeable improvement, and by the time he had taken nine or ten boxes he had recovered his former good health. There has been no sign of a return of the trouble, and I can scarcely say how thankful we feel for the complete restoration of our son's health."

Parents who find their growing boys or girls becoming nervous should lose no time in giving them Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. You may ward off an attack of St. Vitus' dance, or if the trouble has reached that stage the Pills will effect a cure. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE POULTRY WORLD

CARE OF GROWING CHICKS.

Extreme care is necessary in caring for chicks during the growing season in order to secure strong, productive stock. The chicks should be kept in a healthy condition, always growing and free from vermin.

It must be recognized that proper feeding is only one of the factors concerned in the successful rearing of chicks. Proper hatching and proper brooding are also of great importance if strong, healthy flocks are to be raised.

Sour and mouldy foods are responsible for numerous losses every year, and too great care cannot be taken to see that all the foods to which the chicks have access are free from any trace of mould or fermentation.

Grains that have heated, though they may not show any trace of mould, are often injurious and should not be fed. Soft foods which have been mixed with water or milk sour quickly, especially if exposed to the sun, and should not be used if there is the slightest trace of fermentation.

It is a great deal more economical in the long run to throw away tainted food than to take the chance of injuring whole flocks of young chicks by its use. All troughs or other utensils used in feeding chicks should be cleaned and scalded frequently and kept scrupulously free from any trace of mould or fermentation. Great care should be taken in the use of foods which, while neither mouldy nor sour, are soiled by being trampled by the chicks or mixed with soil or droppings. The danger of infection is such that it is never safe to use foods that are in that condition. Remember that only the cleanest foods should be placed before young chicks.

There is practically no danger of over-feeding chicks after they are three or four weeks old and are running at large. They should then be induced to eat the largest possible quantity of food in order to secure rapid growth and development.

A large proportion of the diseases which affect young chicks is due to improper feeding or to injurious foods. Frozen vegetables, tainted meat or any foodstuffs which are not in perfect condition are liable to cause sour crop, inflammation of the crop or stomach, and intestinal and liver disorders, including some forms of so-called 'white diarrhoea."

When chicks are out of condition, slight modifications in rations or methods may result in correcting the tendency to disease. It is much better to protect the health of the chicks by careful feeding than to resort to drugs after diseased conditions have developed.

During early stages of the chick's life, when intestinal troubles are most common, the use of boiled milk and boiled rice will be of great assistance in correcting any tendency toward diarrhoea or inflammation. Boiled milk should be given to drink, and boiled rice should be supplied twice a day in place of the regular feed. Rice should be boiled in a double boiler until it is thoroughly cooked and as dry as possible. When cold, any surplus moisture should be taken up by mixing it with fine bran, secured by sifting ordinary bran through a flour sieve and discarding the coarser grade. Bran itself has a decidedly tonic effect, and the combination of bran and boiled rice will often check what might otherwise become a serious epidemic of diarrhoea. Charcoal also will be found of great value in preventing this trouble.

Where boiled rice and milk are not sufficient to correct the tendency to diarrhoea a mild stimulant, such as ground mustard, cayenne pepper or ginger, may be added, only enough being mixed with the soft food to be noticeable to the taste. This may be given as long as conditions require its use but no longer. Serious liver disorders may result from too long continued use of pepper or ginger.

Chicks suffering from diarrhoea usually have symptoms which are not difficult to recognize. The chicks seem to be weak and to possess little vitality. Within a few days there is a thin, whitish discharge, which soon becomes sticky and clogs the vent or there may be only a streak of whitish substance adhering to the down.

The lack of vitality becomes more apparent as the disease progresses. The infected chicks become listless and huddle together. They seem to be chilly and spend much time beneath the hover or the mother hen. The appetite is lost, the wings droop and the feathers are ruffled.

As a rule the chicks which resist the disease are never able to make up the loss due to this early disease, although they may become fully developed.

Every effort should be made to eliminate from the flock all birds that have at any time been infested with disease.—Dr. Thomas J. Clemens, in N. Y. Sun.

NOTES.

The average beginner overcrowds. This causes undersized specimens and slow maturity. Small flocks do well, where large flocks fail, due largely to the lack of care taken in the larger flock.

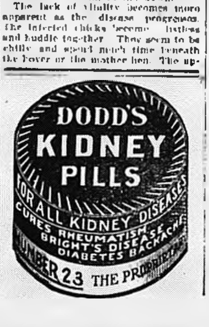
Most poultry keepers, and especially beginners, do twice, and sometimes three times, the amount of work necessary, due to a lack of system and proper equipment. With a good system and equipment much of the drudgery of poultry keeping is avoided.

This is the time of the year for the beginner to purchase the breeding stock for future operations. It is at this time the breeder of high-grade stock, now that hatching season is over, is willing to dispose of part of his stock at a fair price to make room for the fast growing young fowls. Purchase now and get the cream of the flock.

Poultry failures can always be traced to lack of knowledge in poultry methods. The fault has in almost all cases been laid at the door of the hen, when it should have been placed to those who attempted to manage her. Properly managed, the poultry business at all times can be made to pay a fair profit.

That poultry shows will become more popular each year goes without saying. There is, and always will be, a large percentage of people who raise poultry who admire the beautiful as well as the utility end, and, happily, the two can be combined.

Beginners in the majority of cases, when purchasing stock and eggs, or day-old chicks, obtain their money's worth. The great source of any trouble lies in the fact that the average beginner seeks the bargain counter. Purchasing cheap stock, eggs or chicks, will always prove a disappointment, for expectations are greater than should be expected.



ROUMANIA

Balkan Power's Dilemma in the World War.

Like Bulgaria Roumania is only indirectly affected by Italy's entrance into the European war, though indirect effects sometimes have far-reaching consequences. Roumania's position is much like that of the traditional ass between the two bales of hay. To the west of her lies Austro-Hungarian Transylvania, to the east Russian Bessarabia, both of these provinces inhabited predominantly, though by no means exclusively, by Roumanians. Of course Roumania would like them both, but since this is impossible she has been to see which appeared the safer prey.

Last winter, when the Russians seemed about to overrun Hungary, Roumania visibly stirred for a spring at Transylvania. Later on, the Teutonic victories at her very gates gave her pause. To-day she is closely watching the effect of Italy's onslaught upon Austria-Hungary. She is also interested in possible happenings at the Dardanelles.

Roumania, like Bulgaria, would greatly dislike to see Russia at Constantinople. She would then lie squarely in Russia's overland path, and should Austria-Hungary give way to a Slavized Central Europe, Roumania, even with Transylvania, would be but an isolated islet in the Slav ocean. Of course there are strong internal cross-currents which may modify her decision. But, looking at the matter from the standpoint of purely foreign policy, we may expect something like this: If Constantinople falls and the Teutonic allies fail in their stroke against Russia, Roumania will almost certainly strike for Transylvania. If Constantinople stands and Russia crumples up in Galicia and Poland, Roumania will as certainly strike for Bessarabia. In any other event Roumania will probably continue her present neutrality, although, as I have said, there are internal factors which may tip the scales one way or the other.

Such are the main political possibilities involved in Italy's entrance into the European war. They are, as we have seen, both far-reaching and complex. What the actual results will be, only time and the fortune of the Italian arms can disclose.—From "Italy and Her Rivals," by Dr. Ivan Yovitchevitch, in the American Review of Reviews for July.

Black as Mourning.

Anne, Queen of Charles III. of France, was the originator of black as a token of mourning, wearing it upon the death of her husband in 1498. Contrary to that, the accepted mourning of Europe was white.

Black, however, gained great popularity and was quickly adopted. So marked was any deviation from the unwritten law that Mary Queen of Scots was termed the White Queen because she held by the ancient custom when mourning for Lord Darnley.

FRUIT OUTLOOK

Summary of Reports as to Prospects in Ontario.

Below is given a summary of the reports sent in from the chief fruit-growing districts to the Ontario Department of Agriculture:

East of Toronto, including the counties of Ontario, Durham, Northumberland and Prince Edward, apples generally promise a fair to good crop, probably 60 to 70 per cent. of that of last year. Duchess and other summer apples are reported a nearly full crop. Fall apples, medium. Spies only fair, Greenings fair to good, Baldwins and Russets good. Ben Davis very good. Pears and sour cherries very good.

Halton and Wentworth Counties—All varieties of apples generally reported a fair to light crop only, with Spies and Kings better than other varieties. Early and late pears are variously reported a failure to a good crop, averaging probably fair, with Keiffers good. Plums and cherries a full crop.

Niagara District—Elberta peaches are a fair to good crop with other varieties very good. Early and late pears generally light, with the exception of Keiffers, which promise a good crop. Plums probably will be a medium crop only, reports varying greatly from very light to good. Cherries generally do not promise as big a crop as last year. Frost also is reported to have caused considerable damage to cherries and plums, many growers reporting a heavy drop of fruit. Currants, gooseberries, raspberries and blackberries, all give promise of a good crop, though considerable winter killing of raspberry canes is reported. Grapes, especially back from the lake and in low place, suffered very considerably from the frost of May 27th. Probably the total crop will be affected 25 per cent. or more.

Fruit generally through the Niagara district is reported looking well, but not growing much at the time the reports were sent in, owing to the continued cold weather, many growers looking for a heavy crop of fruit.

Welland County—All apples average a light crop. Pears and plums good. Cherries good but not as heavy as 1914. Elberta peaches fair to good, other varieties heavy. Considerable damage to grapes from frost.

Norfolk—All varieties of apples give promise of a light to fair crop only. Pears are a fair crop.

Middlesex reports heavy damage from frost of all varieties of fruit, most correspondents stating that the fruit crop is practically ruined, with the possible exception of Spies, which were hardly in bloom at the time of the frost. Fruit prospects were fair up until the time of frost.

Lambton County also suffered severely in many parts from the frost, especially orchards on low-lying lands. Generally speaking, the Lambton apple crop will be light, though Kings and Russets are fair to good. Peaches on low land are also severely frosted. Plums are a medium crop. Pears light.

Huron, Grey, Bruce and Simcoe report a fair to light crop of apples, the frost doing very severe damage in many sections, some reports stating that the crop was practically ruined.

A very considerable increase in the acreage of strawberries planted out this year is reported from Halton, Wentworth, Lincoln and Norfolk Counties.

Canning factories generally seem to be offering prices if anything a little below those of last year. Prices reported for strawberries range from $1.50 to $1.60 per 24-qt. crate; for raspberries $1.60 to $1.65.

GREAT SHIPS OF OLD.

Noah's Ark About the Size of Modern Ocean Liner.

It is generally agreed that Noah's ark measured about 450 feet in length, 75 feet in breadth, and 45 feet in depth. It is interesting to note that the proportions of these dimensions are practically the same as those of the great modern ocean liners.

The Greeks and the Romans constructed several large vessels measuring upwards of 500 feet. These were built for the emperors or rulers, and were little more than enormous scows, without any means of propulsion.

A vessel 420 feet in length, was built by Ptolemy, which was propelled by 600 rowers, arranged in five banks, using oars 57 feet in length.

The fame of the Thalamegus still lives. This boat, which measured 300 feet in length, 45 feet in breadth, and 60 feet in depth, was said to have been the most beautiful craft in antiquity, and was used exclusively by the Emperor.

A king of Syracuse is also credited with having built a very palatial boat whose cabins were hung with costly silks and decorated with rare statues. After the decline of the Roman Empire no great ships were constructed for more than 1,000 years.

Life Doesn't Wait for You.

It is one of the provoking, but interesting things about life that it will never stop a moment for admiration. No sooner do you pause to enjoy it, or philosophize over it, or poetize about it, than it is up and away, and the next time you glance around it is vanishing over the hill—with the wind in its garments and the sun in its hair. If you do not go on with life it will go on without you.—American Magazine.

CROP OUTLOOK OF DOMINION

Grain in the West Looks Good On the Whole.

Ontario Reports Are Also Quite Favorable.

A special press bulletin issued by the Census and Statistics Office gives the following report on the condition of field crops throughout Canada on July 1, as summarized from telegrams despatched from the Dominion Experimental Farms and Stations and Illustrated Farms in accordance with arrangements made between the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture.

Prince Edward Island—The planting season was very late, but beneficial rains fell frequently from the 9th to the 25th, assuring an excellent hay crop and a full crop of all early sown cereals. Hoed crops and late grains have germinated well and are growing splendidly; fruit prospects are good, as no frost occurred.

Nova Scotia—Kentville—Grain crops are growing well; grass and clover are excellent; potatoes and corn on dry land are making a fine start, but on wet land are doing poorly. The condition of the grain crops is excellent; hoed crops and later cereals have germinated evenly and are coming along well. Antigonish—Hay and pastures are excellent; early sown grain is good, the late sown grain is germinating fairly evenly.

New Brunswick—From Fredericton it is reported that June has been excessively wet throughout central and southern New Brunswick, preventing the planting of crops on wet lands. In northern New Brunswick conditions are nearly normal and crops on well-drained lands are progressing rapidly. The hay crop outlook indicates a yield above average. A report from Harland states the condition of grain crops and grass is light; hoed crops, especially potatoes, are coming along fine. At Onaganco hay is excellent, grain crops are fair; hoed crops have germinated evenly.

Quebec—At Shawville grain crops are looking well, hay is very short, corn was retarded by heavy frosts. The report from Cap Rouge states hay will be poor, the condition of grain crops and silage corn is excellent, root crops have not germinated evenly. At Lennoxville the weather has been favorable for grain and hay. At Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere grain crops started well, but the hay crop is about one-third less than the average.

Ontario—A report from Essex County states fall wheat is headed and shows a heavy crop on a large area, the heading of barley is uneven; oats are good, peas excellent and corn a little backward, turnips are germinating evenly, the hay crop is very light. Ontario County—The condition of grain crops is excellent and hoed crops are looking well. Fruits, early tomatoes and peaches give promise of an excellent crop. The hay crop is good and is mostly harvested. From Ottawa covering the districts of Eastern Ontario the grain crops are reported as looking well, but the hay crop is light and uneven. Hoed crops have germinated evenly, excepting corn, which is backward and uneven, and badly in need of rain.

Manitoba—From Brandon it is reported that crop growth has been retarded by dry weather early in June, and by cold later. Good rains fell during the last half of the month, and there is ample moisture for the present needs. Warm weather had occasional showers would insure a good crop. Hay is light and corn backwards.

Saskatchewan—At Indian Head, Lloydminster, Kindersley and Gull Lake grain crops are reported as looking well or excellent. Late sown wheat, oats and barley showed less damage at Indian Head from frosts of the 7th and 15th than early sown wheat. Hoed crops promise well. At Kindersley oats and flax are well advanced, and at Gull Lake 50 per cent. is in shot blade. Scott Station reports an abundant supply of moisture, with wheat in the shot blade, and a few fields headed out. Other grain crops are coming along equally well, hoed crops are retarded by cool weather and some districts report injury from frost of the 15th. In southwestern Saskatchewan and from Swift Current north to Prelate all crops look excellent. From Prelate west to Empress crops are patchy, due to cutworms, wireworms, and in a few instances to the sowing of poor seed. All hoed crops look well, though late. The report from Rosthern is less favorable. From this station it is reported that frost on the 15th killed corn, tomatoes and squash, retarded potatoes and injured small fruits; that there is no hay crop through lack of rain; and that all grain crops, except those on very well prepared land, are suffering from drought. Unless heavy rains come soon the grain crops will be almost a total failure.

Alberta—Edmonton, Lacombe, Carmangay, Pincher Creek, Macleod, Lethbridge and Foremost, reports grain and hay crops show vigorous growth and root crops are well advanced. Crops in southwestern Alberta are suffering slightly from excessive rains and cold weather. In south and southeastern Alberta all crops are fine, though patchy in a few cases.

British Columbia—The report from Agassiz states that June has been an excellent month for crop growth. Hoot and fodder crops are above the average; haying is well under way, and the clover crop is harvested. In Invermere copious rains have fallen, creating extremely favorable conditions, clover and alfalfa are exceptionally heavy; wheat is good; oats are only fair, hoed crops promise well.

CALL FAILED

Why the Moslem Jihad Did Not Rally Against the Allies.

The men in the government saddle at Constantinople last November issued a call to Moslems everywhere to rally in revolt against their alien rulers. The call was lost in the air. It met with response nowhere. The frantic effort failed utterly. It is important for us, if it be possible, to find the real meaning of this outcome of a plan from which so much was hoped.

We have been accustomed for many years to see on the part of the Moslems of Turkey, of Egypt, and of India an acceptance of aid from Christian nations in material things accompanied by a firm attitude of fidelity to their ancestral faith, and with a revulsion from our religion.

Very few even of the most intelligent among them have been able in the past to understand Christian teaching or to appreciate the constituent elements of truly Christian character.

The events now taking place in Europe have intensified Moslem revulsion from European Christianity and deepened their conviction of the supreme excellence of their own religion.

Why, then, have Moslems who are subjects of Christian governments turned a deaf ear to the call of the Calif and remained loyal to the governments under which they live?

We may interpret their loyalty to their rulers of Moslems under the dominion of England, France, and Russia as meaning that they know that listening to Turkey's appeal would imperil their material interests. Yes, but is this a sufficient explanation? It is very far from sufficient.

Men of the East have from time immemorial been accustomed to a governmental administration and to judicial procedure that made more of personal claims and money inducements than of the demands of right and justice, where, therefore, the rich had every advantage over the poor.

The rich men and men of rank in India and Egypt have of late years often been dazed at finding that neither rank nor wealth could move a judge a hair's-breath from what the law and equity demanded. This has not made them love their western rulers, but it has made them respect and trust them. Their experience under just government has now for two generations profoundly penetrated their thought and life.—From "Moslems and the War," by Rev. George F. Herrick, D. D., in the American Review of Reviews for July.

AIDS IN BATTLE.

Most Unique Ships Accompany Fleet, But Do Not Fight.

One of the largest ships in the British navy does not fight, but it always accompanies the fleet in actual warfare. This ship is the Ark Royal and the most unique in the world. She is the last word in special units, and is at the present time located off the Dardanelles. She is a floating aeroplane factory, and carries spare propellors, wings, floats and every conceivable part of a hydroplane or seaplane. Great Britain is the first navy in the world to possess such a ship. These flying machines accompanying the fleet can be repaired and practically rebuilt right on the ground, by means of this mother ship.

Another famous ship, and which does not fight, attached to the navy, is H. M. S. Cyclops. She is nothing more or less than a huge dockyard foundry, employing three hundred skilled mechanics, in addition to the crew necessary to sail the ship. She does not carry a gun, because every inch of room is required for machinery. Every battleship has a small work shop, but it cannot do big repairs or casting, but the Cyclops can. She carries a complete foundry, where as large a casting as a battleship's propellor can be made. In the ship are huge cupolas or domes for smelting and casting, stretched away above the deck like huge mushrooms.

Over the bow of this ship hangs a huge anchor, made of wood. This is a template for casting a complete anchor, should one of the warships lose one. In addition to her huge repairing plant, the Cyclops carries a vast distilling apparatus to supply fresh water to all the ships in the fleet. She is fitted up with ice-making machines and refrigeration rooms, in which fresh meat is stored for the crews of those small craft, like submarines, torpedo boats and destroyers and small cruisers, which cannot be so fitted. The Cyclops is 500 feet long, and at the time she was built was the first of her type and size in the world.

There is also another ship of the same class, called the Assistance, but she is not so large. There is still another called the Vulcan, of 7,000 tons displacement, which has ability to cruise 10,000 miles without re-coaling. This latter ship has two huge cranes, worked by hydraulic, which are large enough to lift a small vessel clean out of the water on to the deck within half a minute. These cranes are fastened to the keel of the repair ship, to prevent her tipping over when lifting a large vessel. These facts possibly throw light for the general reader upon many matters connected with the royal navy, which must have suggested thought at times.

The Retort Courteous.

Justice Day was a "hanging judge" and when on circuit expedited business in a summary manner. On one occasion the trial of a prisoner concluded at dusk, and the judge ordered candles to be lighted so that he might try another case that night.

O'Connor, a noted Irish barrister, defended, and in protest against night work exclaimed, addressing the court: "What, my lord, try a man by night! What will men say? That justice is not done by Day?"

He obtained his end, and at the next sitting the accused was acquitted.—London Mirror.

Willoughby—Rowand—That this council do now adjourn to meet on Monday, the 9th day of August, for the purpose of levying the Township rates and general business. Carried.

M. A. McCALLUM, Clerk.

FORMOSA

Ed. Rowand and McKerracher were here last week Tuesday.

Mr J A Johnston of Mildmay came here on business by Auto last week Thursday.

Mr Andrew Oberle was here last week Thursday.

Mr Johannes Zinger visited his sister Mrs Lou Lambertus last week in Teeswater.

The Electric Light Co. is busy putting up poles for light.

Rev. Father Bonnger from Berlin is here these few days assisting in church.

Mr Alex. Fedy of Mildmay spent Sunday with his parents here.

Died last week, in Brant, Mrs. Louis Addis. The remains were buried here last Saturday.

Mr Seraph Meyer moved into the house he bought from Jos. Weiler last Monday.

The farmers have a big job to get in their hay on account of the rain.

PINKERTON

Mr and Mrs Howard Birrell of Toronto are visiting the formers parents Mr and Mrs Thomas Birrell.

Miss Coghlan of Berlin is visiting at the Manse.

Mr. Amsey Clegg and son Elmer are at Inverhuron preparing their cottage for a few weeks residence at the lake.

Mr and Mrs Gordon Richie of Inniskillen spent Sunday at Mr John Wilson.

The baseball game on Thursday evening resulted in a victory for the 14th con. boys though it is hard to say how the game would have gone if the rain had not cut it short.

The members of the young people's Guild held a very enjoyable social at the Manse on Thursday evening.

Mrs Elliot and daughter Grace of Vancouver B.C. are visiting at Mr Jas. Murray.

Mr Nelson Fleit and daughter are visiting Mr Wm. Fleits on the 14th con.

The old wooden bridge over the sawmill race is being replaced by a substantial cement structure, the work being in charge of Contractor Wallace of Chepstow. About ten o'clock on Friday night this was the scene of a rather exciting mixup when the hay wagon coming from Eden Grove was driven past the lanterns and over protections into the excavation. The horses were the only sufferers getting badly cut in several places.

NARVA

Mr and Mrs Geo. Moffat and Miss Viola, also Mr and Mrs Jno. Keyes spent Saturday at Mr Thos. Helds.

Mr Willie Keyes and sister Miss Lena went to Ripley on Saturday.

A few from this vicinity attended the social at the Manse given by the Young People's Guild. All report an excellent time.

Apparently Narva is a very attractive place. Mr Lorne Seaborn of Cargill, was in the burg on Saturday evening.

Mr and Mrs W H Moffat and family and Mr and Mrs Geo. Moffat motored to Dungannon on Wednesday July 14 there to attend the wedding of Mr. W. J. Moffat of Edmonton and Miss Mary Olive only daughter of Mr and Mrs H Jones.

Mr and Mrs W H Moffat spent Sunday evening at Mr Jas. Thompson's of Brant.

Three of our Narva Sports have constructed a Dreadnaught to fathom the depths of Mud Lake. Hurrah for a sail!

The Women's Institute meeting held at Mr Geo. Fletcher's Wednesday afternoon was quite a success.

At time of writing Mr Geo Moffat is under the doctor's care with a sore foot.

A number of the young ladies and gentlemen from here took in the social at Mr T H Purdy given by the Methodist League on Friday evening.

Miss Agnes A Moffat is spending a few days at Mr J Thompson's near Glamis.

It is unofficially stated that the height limit for overseas service is to be lowered by an inch. This would have just fallen a fraction of an inch short of the measurement.

There are an even hundred different classes of chickens provided for in the Canadian National Exhibition prize list this year; 3 classes for turkeys, 5 for geese and 8 for ducks. This in addition to the collections and utility breeds.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm Sutton and four children of Albany, N. Y. who for a number of years have been popular summer residents of Southampton for a number of summers, are this year spending the summer at Bailey's Point on Lake Cayuga. They hope to spend next season at Southampton.

Southampton Beacon.

Greatest Crop Yet.

Competent authorities in the Western provinces report that crops never looked better in the West. In those sections where the crops were a complete failure last year, big yields are promised. Harvesting will commence from August 10th to 20th. If the crops can be safely harvested and threshed it will be a banner year for the West.

Rebate for Ford Owners.

Big business men compelled to sign a couple of hundred checks for incidental expences every month occasionally realize what is meant by writer's cramp. The Ford Motor Co. is making preparations to attend to a little office detail of this kind in connection with the [illegible] to be distributed among Ford owners in August. The company is about to write 300,000 checks for $50 each, to be mailed to owners throughout the world. A staff of 50 stenographers is to be employed in this task, requiring 6 weeks for completion.

Should not Criticize.

Prof. Reithdorf's address, here, on Saturday, July 3rd, was entirely different in regards to the Kaiser of Germany, than a year ago. A year again his address he described the Kaiser as being a level headed man, this year he has pronounced him crazy.

The above is from the Ayton Advance and sounds very much as though the editor is criticizing the work of Prof. Reitzdorf who is denouncing German Militarism. Under the present conditions, it behooves the editor of the Advance, whose name is Oscar Widmeyer to refrain from criticism of anyone who is advocating the cause of England, else he might be taken for a pro German.

Walkerton 15 Paris 2

The baseball match which was played here on Saturday afternoon between the Walkerton and Paris teams was a somewhat listless exhibition of the great game. Although the locals were represented by a greatly weakened team, they had little difficulty in landing a victory, scoring in almost every innings, runners crossing the plate fifteen times during the game while Paris scored but two. The teams lined up—

BOWLING NOTES.

The two rinks that attended the Port Elgin bowling tournament last week, came home empty-handed, but report a good time.

Brock McAuley's rink of Southampton, of which Les Bauther is a member, captured second prize in the Association competition at Port Elgin. Each member of the rink secured a handsome cut-glass vase.

Four rinks of Hanover bowlers played here on Friday evening last. One rink emerged victorious, while the remaining three rinks were defeated by big scores.

Two rinks of Walkerton bowlers are attending the Wiarton tournament this week. They are comprised of the following players—T. Pletsch, H. G. Hunter, T. McConnell, and Sam Vogan and A. P. Sieveright (sk.), A. E. McNab, R. J. Hepburn and Dr. Reed.

Mr. H. M. Fox intends taking a rink to the Berlin tournament which will be held on August 2nd and 3rd.

Bravery Recognized.
Mr. Art McCartney did a spectacular stunt on Monday last when he stopped the runaway Dominion Express horse. In recognition of his bravery a number of Mac's friends met at the poolroom in the afternoon and presented him with a leather medal and a huge nosegay of poppies and marigolds with a border of burdock leaves. The boys took the ludicrous view of the episode, but nevertheless Mac deserves credit for the manner in which he stopped the galloping horse.

Death of Mrs. Kent
The grim reaper removed another of Brant township's well known and highly respected citizens on Saturday last, July 24th, when Mrs. Frank Kent passed to the great beyond. The late Mrs. Kent who was 73 years of age had been a resident of Brant for many years, residing on the Durham-Road about two miles west of town. She had been in poor health for several years, suffering from heart trouble and goitre, the latter proving fatal to her. The deceased is survived by her husband and one son, Walter, who have the sympathy of their many friends in their bereavement. The funeral which was largely attended took place to the Walkerton cemetery on Tuesday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. Among those who attended the funeral were relatives and friends from Detroit, Port Elgin, Wiarton and Goderich.

Bowlers Notice of Meeting
A meeting of the members of the members of the Bowling Club will be held at the Armoury on Friday night of this week to make arrangements for Tournament.—C. S. Stephan. Sec'y

Order Not Withdrawn.
A rumor was in circulation last week to the effect that the government shell-box order which had been received by the Knechtel Furniture Company, had been withdrawn. This we are pleased to state is untrue, and originated from the fact that the Company received notice not to proceed with the order under the specifications at first given as a small change was to be made in the boxes. The Company are not at present working on the order and are awaiting the government's instructions. The 25000 boxes when completed will fill ten box cars.

Souvenirs from the Front
Private J. G. Griffin has sent several souvenirs to his home here from the trenches in France. Among them are a rifle belt taken from a German sniper who was killed, and a tobacco can, the property of one of his officers who was also killed by the explosion of a Jack Johnson. These are now on exhibition in Mr. C. A. Fox's window and an account of how he secured them will be found in a letter which appears in this issue of the Telescope. In this letter Pte Griffin asks that tobacco be sent to him. A good smoke is appreciated by almost any of the boys at the front, and the local patriots would do well to start an exclusive fund for the purchase of tobacco for the soldiers and keep the local boys, including Mr. Griffin supplied with the weed.

Girls Go Camping.
The following young ladies with Mrs. E. J. Skelton as chapeon, are spending two weeks camping down the river:—Misses Helena Whitehead, Verna Skelton, Florence Vogt, Rotha Schwindt, Clarice Vogan, Norma Rowland, Donalda McKechnie Ruth Rogers Edith Lewis. The girls are enjoying themselves, with the rod and line, and Ruth Rogers who is quite an artist, created the greatest sensation to date by landing a big shad. Judging by Ruth's big eyes when she hooked the fish, the finny monster(?) was at least three feet long and the farmer's in the vicinity being aroused by her gleeful shouts hurried to the scene by scores to see the fish. Ruth now has such a swelled head that she wouldn't be seen fishing in the Saugeen and will not be content until she gets to the ocean when she will show her friends how to land a whale.

Bermuda Regiment to France
A despatch from Ottawa says:—

"The 38th battalion has received orders to relieve the Royal Canadian Regiment of the permanent force, which has been doing garrison duty at Hamilton, Bermuda, since the war broke out. The R.C. R. will proceed to the front immediately, it being in a high state of efficiency. The 38th will complete its training on the island and will later be relieved by another regiment of the Canadian Expeditionary force. The officers and men of the Royal Canadian Regiment have been urging that they be sent to the front."

There are five Walkerton boys in the regiment which has been doing garrison duty and being trained at Bermuda, viz: Walter Pitt, Harry Curtiss, "Daddy" Sutton, Jerry Jerome, and H. M. McConnell, and these young soldiers according to the above despatch will be in the firing line in the very near future.

Death of Joe Bergmann.
A very regrettable death was that which occurred in Walkerton on Monday, when Mr. Jos. Bergmann passed away after an illness extending over a period of ten month at the early age of thirty one years. The deceased has been a resident of Walkerton for the greater part of his life and for a considerable time was an employee at the R. Truax & Son factory but of late years has been on the staff of the Rattan. He was taken ill some ten months ago with diabetes and although everything possible was done for him it was of no avail and his conditions gradually became worse, death relieving him on Monday afternoon. The late Mr. Bergmann is survived by his wife who was formerly Miss McCarter, daughter of Mr. Alex McCarter of Walkerton. She has the sympathy of a host of friends in her sorrow. Mrs. Jos. Lindsay, and Mrs. Thos Hyslop of Walkerton are sisters of the deceased. The funeral was held to the Walkerton cemetery on Wednesday afternoon, the service being conducted by Rev. Thos. Wilson.

BORN

McCurdy—In Walkerton on Tuesday, July 27th, to Mr. and Mrs Jos. McCurdy, of Brant, (nee Miss M. McIntee), a daughter.

Patrick—In Walkerton on Wednesday 28th, at the Bruce County Hospital, to Mr. and Mrs. C. Patrick, a daughter.

Back in Trenches.
Mr. W. J. McNally received a letter on Monday from Capt. Arthur McNally. The Captain who has now completely recovered from the wound he received stated that he would return to his battalion in the trenches on July 12th.

Lower School Examinations
The results of the Lower School Examinations for admission to Normal Schools and Faculties of Educations were published in the daily papers on Friday last, the following students of the Walkerton High School being successful:—James H. Alexander, Edna Bilger, Stella Bush, Leslie McConnell, Alma Pinkney, Gertrude Rogers, Amelia Schwehr, Hazel Trantor, Marie Weiler, and Winnie Wilson. Of the fifteen from the local school who tried only five failed.

Murray—Rowand.
An event of more than usual interest was solemnized at the home of Mr. Wm. Rowand in Brant, at eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning, when his youngest daughter, Elizabeth Lillie, was united in marriage to Robert Donald Murray, son of Mr. Angus Murray of Brant, one of the township's prosperous farmers. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Thos. Wilson, pastor of Knox church, in the presence of about one hundred guests, the bride being given away by her father. The bride was attended by Miss Pauline Thompson, while Mr. Walter Chisholm acted as groomsman. After the nuptial knot had been tied the wedding party sat down to a delightful wedding dinner. The toast to the bride was proposed by Rev. Thos. Wilson and responded to by the groom. Mr. W. A. Rowand proposed the toast to "the king" and Mr. Thos. Chisholm the toast to "our country." Mr. and Mrs. Murray left on the afternoon G. T. R train on a wedding trip to Brampton and Toronto and on their return will take up their residence on the groom's farm in Brant. The bride was the recipient of many costly and useful presents which show the esteem in which the newly married couple are held by a host of friends, whose best wishes for every happiness go with them in their new sphere of life.

PETITION ABANDONED

The protest filed by the Conservatives against Mr. R. E. Truax who was elected in October 1913 Liberal member of Parliament for South Bruce, was abandoned on Saturday at Osgoode Hall, and the $1,000 formally required as deposit in such cases was returned. The Liberal cross-petition against Wellington D. Cargill, the Conservative candidate who was defeated by Mr Truax was likewise withdrawn. Mr Truax accordingly will continue to occupy the seat for South Bruce in the House of Commons during the life of the present Parliament.

The above paragraph was clipped from the Toronto News of Saturday. The people of South Bruce and in fact over the whole Dominion will recall all the mean things which were printed in the Conservative papers and particularly the Bruce Herald and Times and the Toronto News when the protest was entered on December 5th. 1913 and all the reckless and unwarranted charges that were made. From the time the protest was entered until it was abandoned yesterday not one jot or tittle of evidence has been produced in support of the charges.

The News featured the announcement of the protest with a big black heading, "Election Corruption Rivalling the Days of Minnie M." Has the Tory party exposed it or even attempted to prove it? Such corruption was not practised by the Liberals in that famous bye-election and well the Tories of South Bruce know it. But how unfair was such language to R. E Truax and the Liberal party and how utterly untrue? In its issue of December 5th, 1913, the News went so far as to insult the respectable German people of South Bruce by stating in part, "there was beer galore throughout the riding which contains a large German vote, AND GERMANS LIKE BEER. The example of the News was followed by the Bruce Herald&Times and our contemporary even went farther than the Toronto paper in making personal charges against Mr. Truax and attempting to do our estimable member, personal injury and according to that papers views of the situation the Liberal party in South Bruce were guilty of infringment of every clause of the election act. These papers asserted that the Conservatives had in their possession over one hundred and fifty charges behind their efforts to have the election declared void.

The threatened protest which was to have been "pushed to the limit" and about which much has been written has faded into thin air, with the instigators of the protest offering no reason for dropping it. The only assumption left for the general public is that their charges lacked foundation and the Liberals were guilty of no wrong doing in the great South Bruce bye-election of October 1913.

To Teach in Durham.
Miss Mae Cryderman daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Cryderman has accepted a position on the staff of the Durham High School. She takes the place of Miss Oldfield, who resigned.

Services to be Resumed.
The Walkerton Evangelical church has been closed for the past three weeks and painters and decorators have been engaged in improving the appearance of both the interior and the exterior of the edifice. The repairs and painting have now been completed and the services in the church will be resumed on Sunday next. The pastor Rev. Mr. Pietsch, will occupy the pulpit.

Mildmay in Finals
The Mildmay football team won the second round of the semi-finals W.F.A. games, defeating the New Dundee team by one goal on the round. The first game in New Dundee resulted in a win for Mildmay by 1-0 and on Friday the return game played in Mildmay resulted in a tie 2-2. Armond Whitehead scored both Mildmay's goals in the home game. By defeating New Dundee, the Stars have thus qualified to meet the Listowel aggregation in the finals. The dates of the games have not yet been arranged.

Preacher has Busy Day.
Yesterday was a decidedly busy day for Rev. Thos. Wilson, pastor of Knox church, he having officiated at no fewer than four different services. In the morning he christened the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Rowand and later officiated at the Murray-Rowand wedding and in the afternoon conducted the funeral service for the late Joseph Bergmann and in the evening presided at the weekly prayer service. Mr. Wilson states that this is the first time in his ministry that he has officiated at four different services in one day.

Pte Weidner Discharged
Pte. Wm. Weidner who joined the local company of the third contingent and was a member of the special detail company who left for England some weeks ago a s reinforcements for the Princess Pats, has been discharged from the service owing to sore feet. Pte. Weidner has always been troubled with his pedals and the long and tedious marches have put them in such a condition as to incapacitate him. He is still in England and has written to a friend here stating that he will try and join a transport company and failing in this, he will probably be obliged to return home.

Dollar for Jumping Fence.
At the lacrosse match on Wednesday afternoon a young man was seen to gracefully scale the top of the high fence about the ball ground rather than pay his two-bits at the gate. P C Bone saw him and promptly took the name and also put him out of the grounds. On Wednesday morning he faced Police Magistrate Creasor and it cost him a dollar without costs for his escapade. Thus he would have been seventy-five cents to the good by paying at the gate, rather than jumping the fence. The police have instructions now to take the names of all who are caught turning this favorite trick of scaling the fence and saving their money—presumably to add to their bank account.

The above from the Owen Sound Times relates to a grievance with which every sporting organization in all the smaller country towns has to contend. In Walkerton a great many boys and also young men take this means of securing admission to games, rather than dig down and fork out the usually small admission fee of 15c. The lack of finances is largely the cause of such a small amount of sport in Walkerton and if the local police were to follow the example of the Owen Sound officers and arrest some of these fence jumpers, it would undoubtedly result in the swelling of the gate receipts at all future games.

LETTER FROM FRANCE.

The following letter was written in the trenches in France by Pte. G. J. Griffin the British reservist who left Walkerton at the begining of the war and who has been in the trenches constantly since the British landed on French soil almost a year ago. The friend who received the letter kindly submitted it for publication.

July 3rd, 1915.

Dear......

Was pleased to receive your interesting letter yesterday..............

You don't know how I wish I could see and be with my family whose lives are being spent without me. Isn't it enough to break one's heart when you come to think of it all? What the result will be no one knows, and no one can imagine what it is like to be here. My brothers who were out here, I am

A GIFT OF A SOUL

The silence of death succeeded these strange words. All the guests felt an icy chill creep over them. One would have thought that the ghost of the man whom they had once known and loved was about to appear before them. The men looked at each other, vexed by this sudden outburst, which cast a gloom over the feast which had begun so joyously. The women began to laugh, without comprehending what was taking place. Clemence, however, furious, bit her livid lips, and striking the table sharply with her knife, her glass fell with a crash to the floor.

"A broken glass!" cried Laure d'Evreux. "That is an unlucky omen."

"All this is truly absurd, Jacques," cried Clemence in a voice that trembled with anger. "Our friends have not come here to listen to such nonsense."

"He has drunk too much, our good Jacques," cried Sophie Virollay. "It is only half-past twelve, which is a little too early."

"No, I am not intoxicated," said the young man, whose face assumed a terrible expression. "I said that Laurier was mad. Does any one here doubt it? Among you all, who saw him during the last few months of his life, and who witnessed the anguish he endured, is there one who denies the truth of what I say? Ah! you are silent. Clemence herself does not speak. It is because she knows well that Laurier was mad, and why he was mad."

The countenance of the actress at this speech became yellow with rage, as if gall had replaced the blood in her veins. Her beautiful bosom swelled with rage, and in a hissing voice she cried:

"You make us regret him. It is a pity he is not in your place, and you in his!"

"Patience. I shall soon be there," said Jacques with a terrible smile, "for I, in my turn, am leading the same life of torture which drove him to suicide. I can judge of his sufferings by what I myself endure, and I can understand how he resolved to bear them no longer. We were speaking just now of Dr. Davidoff, and we recalled the fantastic stories he related to us on a certain night. Patrizzi, do you remember how Laurier, after listening in silence to Davodiff, cried suddenly: 'Jacques, if I should ever grow tired of life I will bequeath my soul to you?' I see you have not forgotten. Well, before that very night was over he was dead, and I, who had barely a breath of life, recovered my health. A few days later, Prince, meeting me at a masked ball at Nice, you said to me jestingly: 'It seems that you have now an entirely new soul, that of your friend Laurier.' You little knew how true was what you said. This soul was in me. I felt it, strong and ardent, with all its passions that had been the ruin of the unfortunate Pierre—an inordinate love of pleasure, a desire to be madly loved, an unconquerable passion for play—that consumed me in their fires. A woman crossed my path; she attracted me irresistibly, fatally. It was impossible for it to be otherwise, for I had within me the soul of Pierre, filled by the ardent love he had cherished for this woman. Oh, I had a gleam of reason; I foresaw for an instant my fate, and I tried to resist her power, but the spell of the enchantress was upon me and my efforts were vain. All my being impelled me toward her. I obeyed her as a dog obeys his master—she had only to raise her finger and I returned to her after swearing I would never see her again. Thus I have followed step by step the same path that led Pierre Laurier to his ruin. Like him I gambled, because I had need of money—a great deal of money. Like him I forgot everything but the woman I at once hated and adored. He had sacrificed to her his genius and his fame. I betrayed for her those dearest to me. I plundered my mother and neglected my sister. He was base and I have been baser. And now do you think I am in my right mind and that I can reason clearly?"

He rose to his feet; his lips foamed slightly, his hands trembled, and he gave a forced laugh. He raised his glass filled with champagne and said:

"I drink to all of you, friends and rivals in the affections of the woman I love. And I drink to the memory of the absent one—Pierre Laurier."

He raised his glass to his lips, but he did not drink. His glance, directed toward the terrace, had become fixed as if in terror. He uttered a hoarse cry and took a step backward. He had caught sight of the man whose name he had just uttered—Pierre Laurier, mounting the steps with Davidoff. While he was advancing toward them Jacques devoured him with his eyes, breathless, stupefied, a cold sweat upon his forehead.

When the two men paused at the threshold of the room, he made a wild gesture as if to shut them out from his terrified vision, then put his hand to his throat as if suffocating, and cried in a hollow voice:

"Pierre, what do you come to seek here? You know well that we cannot both exist upon the earth together! If you live I must die!"

"Jacques!" cried Laurier, advancing toward him with outstretched hands.

De Vignes tried to push him back, but suddenly turned pale, and uttering a hoarse cry sank into the arms of his friend.

"He is dead," said Berneville in a trembling voice. "Let some one call for help—"

"Do not stir," said Davidoff; "he is not dead, and we need no help."

He poured some water into a glass, and with it moistened the temples of the unfortunate man, who gave a deep sigh.

Of all those who had gathered around him hastily, Clemence was the first to recover her self-possession.

"What do you want to do?" she asked Davidoff.

"To take M. de Vignes away," returned the Russian.

Pierre took a step toward Clemence, and placing himself in front of her,

"Do you mean to oppose our doing so?" he asked, coldly.

The actress raised her eyes to his face. She saw that he was calm; his eyes were sad, his lips wore a disdainful smile. He was again the Pierre Laurier of the early days of their acquaintance, with his haughty and thoughtful brow, his manly air, and there was a melancholy sweetness in his voice that stirred the heart of Clemence to its very depths. She wished to treat him with insolence, but a sudden humility softened her heart. She glanced at Pierre with a timid smile, and approaching closer to him, said

"Is it prudent to take him away now? Come with me; I will show you to a room where he can be cared for, and where he will not be disturbed."

"It is useless," responded Pierre. "Neither he nor we will remain here a moment longer."

"Why?" asked Clemence. "Are we then enemies?"

Laurier pointed to Jacques, gasping for breath in the arms of Davidoff, and without anger, but with unalterable firmness, answered:

"I have forgiven you the injury you have done me. I will never forgive you the injury you have done him. Adieu."

Davidoff and Pierre carried Jacques, still unconscious, across the garden, to the carriage which had brought them.

Hardly were they out of sight than the restraint which had weighed upon the guests disappeared.

"Ah, my children!" cried Burat, "what a termination for a feast!"

"They did well to take him away," said Mariette de Fontenoy; "it was becoming unendurable; I have a horror of scenes at table."

"You have the consolation of knowing, however, Clemence," said Duveinay, "that the men who kill themselves for your sake always come back to life again."

Clemence remained silent for a moment, her head sunk thoughtfully on her breast. Then looking around at her guests with a sardonic glance,—

"You may say what you choose of Pierre Laurier," she said, abruptly, "but among you all there is not one who is his equal! — And now it is near two o'clock. Let us go to the race-course to see Selim's horse come in a bad last."

* * * *

Pierre and Juliette had been married for three months. The young wife had recovered the bloom of health. Laurier, overwhelmed with orders, worked all day, and he and Juliette spent the evenings with Mme. de Vignes and Jacques. Slowly but surely Jacques was sinking to the tomb. Cured of his dangerous madness he had become amiable and gentle. It seemed as if he was resolved upon making those around him forget the anguish he had caused them to suffer, and not once, since he had been brought to his mother's house, had he been heard to utter a complaint. It seemed as if he accepted suffering and death as an expiation for his faults.

Emaciated and hollow-eyed, his hair almost white, there remained not a trace of the beauty that had turned so many heads. He looked like an old man. He now scarcely ever rose from his easy-chair. A plaid thrown over his knees, his thin hands stretched out before him, he would sit for hours by the window, sunk in a revery, or gazing idly at the passers-by as they hastened along the street. He refused even to drive with his mother to the Bois to take the air. He would answer with a smile:

"I must have a little vanity, and not show myself looking so weak and miserable to those who remember me young and vigorous. Go you, my dear mother, and when you come back you will tell me about what you have seen; thus I shall enjoy the pleasure of the drive without its fatigue."

Only when his sister came would his melancholy countenance light up with pleasure. He could not bear Juliette out of his sight, and would excuse himself for so selfishly depriving her husband of her society, by saying:

"Let him bear with me. I have only a little while more left in which to enjoy it, and he has a life-time."

One day he said to her:

"Do you remember, Juliette, the terrace at Beaulieu, and the conversation we had there together?"

The young girl shuddered with horror at this recollection. She wished to interrupt her brother, to prevent him from recalling those sad days. But he insisted with an obstinacy unusual with him.

"The remorse I endure is so bitter," he said, "that at all costs I want to be delivered from it. At night, during my sleepless hours, it tortures me. It envenoms every moment of my life. I have been very guilty toward you who are so sweet and innocent. Ah, so long as you do not forgive me I cannot be at rest!"

"But what have you done, my poor brother, that you should thus accuse yourself?" said Juliette. "Our sorrow was the same, and we mingled our tears together."

"No, the sorrow was not the same," said Jacques in a low voice, "for my sorrow was assumed. I believed that I lived with the life of Pierre, and I did not regret his death. Oh, what I tell you is terrible, but the truth must be said. I had the certainty that you would die of your grief, yet I felt regret at the conviction only because your death would seem like a reproach to my joy. Yes, I was such a monster that I accepted the thought that Pierre was dead and that you also were going to die. But what were all those deaths to me compared to the certainty of my living? I dared to allow this thought to enter my mind. Man is indeed a cowardly and miserable brute."

His cheeks were burning. He resumed in a gasping voice:

"Between your life and mine, I was satisfied that yours should be the sacrifice. And instead of mourning my lost friend I was rejoiced to live in his stead. I was, as you see, my dear sister, for a time mad. In order to cure me Davidoff tried a dangerous experiment. He wished to prove the power of the moral nature over the physical, of the spirit over the body. He desired to learn if faith could produce material results. The experiment, most unfortunately, was tried on a very weak nature, an impressionable imagination. It produced only too powerful a result. Like the miracle workers of old who played upon the credulity of the ignorant, he said to me: 'You are cured; you have received within you another life; live then.' And I was so eager to believe what he told me that I ended by believing it. But at the price of what mental hallucinations, what deterioration of character! I had been amiable and good; I became cruel and selfish. And in order to forget, in order to silence the protestations of my conscience, I threw myself into a life of pleasure, I gave myself up to vice. The transformation that had taken place made me so different from what I had been that I seemed to live with a double life. There was in me the physical being whose acts were inspired by a species of madness, and an intellectual being who protested with groans against all these excesses. For nearly a year I have lived like a criminal, hating my crime and condemning myself for it. Such is the life I have been leading. And it was to prolong this hell that I was willing that Laurier should die, and thought it right that you should follow him. But a just God interposed. Pierre and you are alive, and it is I who am about to die."

"Jacques!" interrupted the young wife, bending over her brother's hand and letting her tears fall upon it.

The dying man recovered his breath with difficulty and said with solemnity:

"Tell me that you forgive me, and that when I am no longer among you, you will sometimes think of me with pity and affection."

"Ah, yes! I forgive you," returned Juliette, "since you insist on my saying those unnecessary words, and there is no merit in my doing so, for I love you."

Jacques smiled gently.

"Decidedly," he said, "women are better than we are."

"But Jacques, you will live," cried Juliette.

"To what purpose?"

Then his expression changed, and with a pathetic attempt at gayety, he said:

"Besides, that would not be possible; for now it is you who possess the soul of Pierre."

Six weeks later, as the autumn was drawing to its close, and the last leaves were falling from the trees, they all set out for the south. They saw again with mingled pleasure and sadness the Villa of Beauville, the pine wood, thuyas and the fir-trees, and the little bay encircled by its red rocks, where the waves died murmuringly away on the beach. Jacques seemed for a time to revive under the influence of the southern sun; then he grew weaker and more sombre than before, and one evening, surrounded by those who loved him, he gently exhaled his latest breath.

He sleeps upon a hillside sheltered by orange-trees, lulled by the fragrant breezes, and on his tomb may be read these words:

JACQUES DE VIGNES.
God has taken to Himself his poor suffering soul.

The End.

KING'S WINE CELLAR.

Magnificently Stocked, Though Royal Family is Temperate.

The cable reports that King George has climbed on the "water wagon" as an example to his subjects during the war. As a matter of fact, very little spirits have been drunk at Georges palace, and the punch, that famous tipple of a hundred years ago, when deep drinking was the rule, is practically unknown. Nevertheless, the King has a big wine cellar, the head of which bears the title of the "Gentleman of the Cellars."

It is his duty to attend or to be represented at all the principal sales and to acquire suitable "lots" and quantities. The fact that the King is really the buyer is, of course, kept secret to prevent prices from being run up. The King has his own wine sent to private houses when he accepts invitations to dinner, except in places where he is an old or frequent visitor, and knows what his special tastes are understood and will be catered to.

The bulk of the King's wines and spirits is stored in huge cellars beneath St. James' Palace. A certain supply, however, is kept at Windsor Castle and Buckingham Palace, and in each case the stock is of comparatively small dimensions, and on the occasion of State banquets or the entertainment of royal guests the necessary supplies are drawn from the St. James' stores. At one time the stock of wine, accumulated during various reigns, was of enormous dimensions. No proper record was available, and one of the first acts of the King in coming to the throne was to order a thorough overhauling of the piles of barrels and casks and bottles. The result was that many thousands of dusty and cobwebbed bottles were brought to light. These contained wines of extraordinary age, but of a class seldom drunk in these times—Canary, Madeira, heavy ports and brown sherries, and many strange liquors of unknown origin, the gifts of foreign rulers. The chief wine stocked in recent years for the King's use has been champagne, which is practically the only wine used at State banquets; although wines figure on the royal menu they are rarely served. The King himself has always been a light drinker, seldom indulging in more than two glasses during a dinner.

The staff of cellarman and bottlers at St. James' Palace is a large one, and is under the control of a chief clerk and a chief cellarman, whose duty it is to check the receipt and delivery of every bottle and to see that the correct wines are supplied according to special circumstances.

Wages of the cellar staff are paid out of the King's private purse. High court officials are given certain allowances of wine and the chief servants an allowance of spirits.

Then the Rain Stopped.

Australia is the land of contrasts. A drought once lasted for seven years. But what is there in moisture to compare with the persistency of Australian rain when it does see fit to fall? For eleven weeks without stopping did the rain continue to moisten the dry places of Sydney some years ago, washing out most cruelly the brief, bright season of winter, when the Australia looks for living instead of existence and peace instead of pressure. And what rain it shot from the clouds like arrows, and the whole world was a battlefield during that July. As the arrows darted into the earth, the earth rose and dashed into the air, and rain and mud met and grappled with each other, day after day, night after night, week after week. And the battle was neither to the rain nor to the mud. A strange and horrid situation arrived. Sydney ran clean out of galoshes. For two weeks not a galosh was to be had in the rain drenched city for love or money. Then a ship came loaded arrived from somewhere or other. And then the rain stopped! — London Mail

UNDOLLARED DIGNITIES.

(New York World)

To those dollar devotees of our country whose sole criterion of success is opulence, whose sole standards of happiness are luxuries, whose sole measure of distinction is splurge, we submit for consideration as earnest as they are congenitally capable of giving, the $15,000 estate left to his wife at his death by Rear Admiral T. Mahan.

It is doubtful if any book in this generation has exerted a profounder world-wide influence on international thought and policy than "Influence of Sea Power Upon History."

Here was a man enjoying the honor of having risen to the top of his profession, enjoying the creative delights of brilliant literary work, enjoying the exercise of tremendous power through the influence of this work, a man second, intellectually, influentially without a superior in the United States, living in the most complete contentment in a [illegible] cottage at Quogue! Power without the aid of money, position without the aid of money, pleasure without the need of money! Could any career be more ideal?

And yet we suppose that the first instinct of thousands of our worshipers of the showy life will be to sigh at the irony of fate which made it possible for a man of such distinction to be so fundamentally incompetent as to die leaving an estate of only $15,000!

Wonderful for the Blood!

Cures Sallow Skin, Headache, Languor and Tiredness.

You don't need to be told how you feel—blue, sort of sickish, poor appetite, vague pains, tired in the morning. This condition is common at this season.

Fortunately there is prompt relief in Dr. Hamilton's Pills, which immediately relieve the system of all poisons and disease-producing matter.

Thousands have been so utterly depressed, so worn out as to be despondent, but Dr. Hamilton's Pills always cured them. "I can speak feelingly on the power of Dr. Hamilton's Pills," writes C. T. Fearman, of Kingston. "Last spring my blood was thin and weak; I was terribly run down, had awful headaches and a gnawing, empty feeling about my stomach. I couldn't sleep or work until I used Dr. Hamilton's Pills—they did me a world of good." At all dealers in 25c. boxes.

Paid the Fine.

A policeman in a country village where "cases" were rare one day came across the landlord in an incapable state. The chance was too good to be missed, so the landlord was summoned and fined to the amount of 14s 6d. The fine was paid, but the policeman's feelings can be better imagined than described when, on reaching home, he found his rent had been raised sixpence per week, and so it continued for twenty-nine weeks, when the landlord coolly informed him that he had paid the fine and could have his house at the former rent.—London Answers.

The clock in the waiting room was several minutes faster than the one in the office, and the passenger asked the porter which clock was correct. After scanning the clocks carefully, the porter, with much satisfaction to himself, replied: "It makes no difference which is right; the train goes at 2.15 anyhow."—Christian Register.

About Children's Teeth.

If a child's second set of teeth remain abnormally short and doll-like it is wise to consult a doctor, as it may be because he is not developing properly owing to a lack of bone forming constituents in his food. One should change the diet in such a case and give something containing plenty of lime such as haricots, lentils and milk; also they should have plenty of hard, well-baked bread crusts.

Little heaps of crusts are often left on a child's plate. A child should never be allowed to leave them, for too much soft food is often the cause of the early decay of second teeth, as well as of their undeveloped and irregular formation.

Man's teeth were given to him for grinding and chewing, and if they are never used for hard food they soon decay.

Ridged or ribbed teeth are a sure sign of a system overcharged with uric acid. Rheumatism is latent; these ridges are warning signals.

Do you know what these are? They are teeth that appear as though they had a "picot" edging or little sawlike edge on them, and they nearly always mean that the owner is below par. The serrated edge is really the commencement of a decay that will in time cause serious damage to the child's health.

A Mother's Secret of Success.

The well known proverb "Example is better than precept" is only another form of expressing the predominating power of sympathy, for example can have little influence except in so far as a sympathetic feeling in the observer leads him to imitate it. So that "Example is better than precept" means only that sympathy has more influence in the human heart than reasoning.

This principle, so powerful at every period of life is at its maximum in childhood. The child's thoughts and feelings are spontaneously drawn into harmony with the thoughts and feelings of those around him whom he loves and this leads naturally to imitation, or reproduction, of their actions.

The great secret of success for a mother in the formation of the character of her children is to make them respect and love her and then simply let them see what she wishes them to be. About all that is to make them respect and love her is to control them by a firm government where control is required and to indulge them almost without limit where indulgence will do no harm. This is true, but we often forget the latter half and wonder at our failures.

ISSUE NO. 30, 1915

MEN FOR THE FRONT

There are many men in Canada who are anxious to go and play their part in the great war, who are willing to go as officers, but from want of adequate military training, or for other reasons, are unable to obtain commissions. There are other men who would prefer to join the ranks simply because they realize the enormous responsibility of the wastage of life which results from the bad leadership of an improperly-trained officer.

Some of these men hesitate to go in the ranks, merely because they are uncertain of finding the congenial companionship of men of similar training and tastes

Now, there is an organization in Canada exactly suited to the requirements of such men, and its existence should be brought clearly to the notice of every young men in Canada.

The Universities of Canada are working loyally together to raise company after company, and to send them overseas to reinforce as units that famous regiment, the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry.

These companies are composed of men from the Universities of Canada, the friends of such men, and broadly speaking, from men of that type.

It must be clearly understood that they are not all university men, for there are bank clerks, lawyers, architects, engineers, ranchers and others, and it has been found such men pull well together and enjoy military life to the full. If the existence of such a force was known throughout the length and breadth of Canada, there would be no difficulty in recruiting a full company within a week.

The First University Company, under the command of an excellent leader, Captain Gregor Barclay, has been for some time in England. An eminent military authority has declared this to be the finest company which has ever sailed from Canada.

The Second University Company was composed of men of splendid type, and was embarked recently at Montreal.

The Third Universities Company (and note that the plural is deliberate) is recruiting with fair rapidity, and there is every hope that it will reach the high mark of success attained by the first two companies.

There is certainly no difficulty in obtaining officers, but it is harder to find picked men for sergeant-major, company quartermaster-sergeant, platoon sergeants and section leaders, on whom largely rests the success of the company. Indeed, Canada needs chiefly a training school for non-commissioned officers

The general principle is followed of giving commissions to well-qualified men from the university or from the district which furnishes recruits.

The west has certainly been a great recruiting ground for the universities companies, and the men who have proved themselves good soldiers, well disciplined and efficient, with fine physique. It is hoped that the Maritime Provinces will rival the west in furnishing recruits. Indeed, in the second company men, doubtless Canadians, come to join from Oklahoma, Arizona and Missouri.

A recruit can be examined medically and attested in his own district, and transportation will be provided to Montreal.

All information can be obtained from Captain A. S. Eve, 382 Sherbrooke street west, Montreal, the headquarters of the successive companies.

The newspaper- and publicity agents, by their voluntary aid, freely given, have shown themselves to be the most efficient means of furnishing recruits, but we ask every reader to help the men to join the company they are looking for, and the company to find the men required.

Height of Waves.

Among the most trustworthy scientific measurements of ocean waves are those of Lieutenant Paris, of the French navy. The highest waves measured by him were in the Indian Ocean between the Cape of Good Hope and the island of St. Paul. Thirty waves measured during a northwest gale there averaged twenty-nine and one-half feet in height, and six of them, following one another with beautiful regularity, were thirty-seven and one-half feet in height. Some still higher waves were seen, but not measured. In a moderate breeze the length of a wave was found to be about twenty-five times its height, but in a gale only eighteen times.—London Globe.

Why Teeth Chatter.

Although the muscles which affect the action of the jaws are especially under the control of the brain, the chattering of the teeth is really a spasm caused by chill or fear, and all spasms act independent of the will. The muscles which operate the jaw act in a series of involuntary little contractions which pull the jaw up and permit it to fall of its own weight. This action is quick, and the chattering occurs from frequent repetition. The cold has a similar effect upon the jaw muscles to that which some poisons have in causing spasmodic action in other parts of the body.

"STATE SALARY."

(London Advertiser)

A large percentage of advertisements for help appearing in the newspapers contain the words "state salary expected." The natural inference is that the lower-priced man is likely to secure the appointment, at least it is an invitation to every applicant to place a low value on his services, and if he is successful, to value his situation according to his remuneration.

Is it not time this country abandoned the idea that the cheapest labor is the best? In every line of industry to-day the demand is for efficiency. Employers claim they can get help, but not of the right kind. Are they themselves not to blame for encouraging the "state salary" applicants, and thus putting a premium on inefficiency?

Every employer who values his business wants its affairs conducted according to a high standard. If he has a proper business system he knows exactly what it is worth to him to have every task in his establishment performed accurately. Would it not increase the value and popularity of his product, whatever it may be, to pay the maximum price for labor, and demand the maximum in efficiency? If such a rule were general it undoubtedly would raise the standard of Canadian workmanship.

EAT LESS MEAT.

The British Board of Trade is conducting a campaign designed to make John Bull eat less roast beef and more vegetables. It does not ask him to eat less food. But rather change his staple article of diet. It would make John largely a vegetarian for the duration of the war. Meat substitutes, it is said, fall into four classes. These are: (1) the pulses (peas, beans and lentils; (2) eggs and egg products (omelettes, custards, and the like); (3) milk and milk-products, cheese (most digestible when cooked with liquid), dried milk, and many dishes compounded of these: (4) nuts and nut-products—also to be wrought into numberless dishes. Class (4) is only touch used by very strict vegetarians; a nut diet is said to be very hard for beginners to digest. Beginners will find salvation easiest with classes (1) and (2): though many experienced vegetarians use them little, because they resemble meat so closely as to share with it certain undesirable features which people who have abandoned meat altogether often desire to avoid.

We are told that the longer vegetarianism is practised, the simpler as a rule become the demands of the palate, which tends to be blunted by the strong flavors of a meat dietary, and when freed from them appreciates much more adequately the flavor of simple things. This campaign is a sort of hand maiden to Premier Asquith's propaganda on behalf of thrift

A PLACE IN THE SUN.

The Kaiser wanted "a place in the sun." He wanted colonies. He wanted Germany over all. Hence his big navy, his shining armor and the rattling of his sword in its sheath. He went to war with this purpose in view. He has still such a purpose in his mind, and he looks longingly across the Atlantic to Canada. But so far his plans have miscarried. His place in the sun has been circumscribed. He is being gradually shut in. He was not long at war before he began to lose the possessions he already possessed. Germany had colonies in Africa, Asia and the Pacific. But she soon began to lose them one by one. Early in the war Great Britain seized German Samoa, the Solomon Islands and German New Guinea. Last fall Tsing Tau, in China, yielded to the British-Japanese attack. Now German Southwest Africa goes by the board. Togo, another African German territory, was taken last August. Kamerun, a large German colony north of the Congo, was conquered by the British and French in September. German East Africa has not as yet been overcome, although several times attacked, and this will probably be the next British objective. It is the largest of the German African colonies which latter have a total population of over 13,413,000 mostly natives.

Of course, we are told that the fate of the German colonies will be decided on the continent of Europe, that these colonial wars were only so much waste of lives and property. But the Germans evidently did not think that when they attacked British South Africa. How can anything happen in Europe that will alter the fate of Tsing Tau captured by the Japanese? In any event should peace terms be a matter of compromise, these captured colonies would be quite a lever in the hands of the allies in any adjustments that might be made. But with the allies victorious, as they will be we are afraid that Germany will receive back few of her colonial possessions.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

For the second time the courts have ruled that Regulation 17 of the Ontario Department of Education, defining the use of the French language in Ontario schools, was legal and that the Legislature was within its rights in making those provisions. Sir William Meredith, before whom the appeal was tried, says in his judgment that "I am unable to find anything which supports the contention of the learned counsel for the appellant that the right to use the French language in the separate schools of the Province was guaranteed by treaty or otherwise to the French-speaking nor am I able to appreciate the contention that that is a natural right pertaining to them which the Legislature is powerless to impair or destroy." This is definite enough and supports the judgment of Mr. Justice Lennox in the first trial. Mr. Meredith holds that the French language has no more rights in Ontario than that given it by the British North America Act. It may be necessary yet to carry the case to the foot of the throne.

There are two points in connection with this matter that need consideration. It may be taken for granted that the French population in this Province desire the children to have a good English education. Does Regulation 17, in providing that education, have an injurious effect on the French language in those schools? If it has, then there is room for complaint. If it does not interfere injuriously with the acquiring of a knowledge of French it should not be objected to because it helps to give the children a good English education. Then do the rights given the French language in Quebec extend to Ontario? Mr. Meredith says they do not, and we think that he is right. If it has the same rights in Ontario as in Quebec, then it has the same rights all over Canada. It would have the same rights as has the English language in, say, British Columbia, or any other Province, no matter how sparse the French population. To grant the French such rights while the German and other foreign-speaking people were denied similar rights would not be just nor fair. The agitation will likely continue until a final judgment is given by the highest court in the realm.

WAS SO WEAK WOULD HAVE TO STAY IN BED.

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills Cured Her.

Mrs. J. Day, 234 John St. South, Hamilton, Ont., writes: "I was so run down with a weak heart that I could not even sweep the floor, nor could I sleep at night. I was so awfully sick sometimes I had to stay in bed all day as I was so weak. I used three and a half boxes of Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills, and I am a cured woman to-day, and as strong as any one could be, and am doing my own housework, even my own washing.

"I doctored for over two years, but got no help until I used your pills."

Milburn's Heart and Nerve Pills are 50c per box, 3 boxes for $1.25, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

EDITORIAL NOTES

The Manitoba Tories promise to turn over a new leaf.

The Manitoba Tory attacks with poisoned gas were repulsed by the Liberals.

The N. Y. World says if Kitchener does not get the men he wants when he calls them he will go after them. We believe that.

Premier Norris, of Manitoba, will appeal to the country on August 6th. We have no doubt of his securing the confidence and support of the electors.

It is reported that the U. S. army officers acting as observers with the German forces have been withdrawn. Relations were becoming too strained. God strafe the States.

Even Britain's coalition Government is being heckled in Parliament every day. But if Sir Wilfrid Laurier should ask a question in the Dominion Parliament, he is denounced as a seditious and pestilential fellow.

It is said that twenty-four German steamers interned in Norwegian harbors have mysteriously disappeared. The Kaiser may want to use them to carry his invading troops to Britain's shores.

Germany is said to get munitions of war from the United States via South America. The pro-Germans should reflect if the export of war munitions were stopped by the American Government Germany would be hit as well as the allies.

The great plant of the United Steel Corporation, or of its subsidiary, the Illinois Steel Company, at Gary, Ind., partially shut down for the last two years, this week began work with a force of 12,000 men, an increase of 6,000 over the average number on the payroll recently. Austria and Germany want the plant again closed up.

A number of Manitoba politicians connected with the scandal are said to be volunteering for the front. Of Dr. Montague, the Ottawa Free Press says:

> Why should Hon. Dr. Montague, former Minister in the Roblin Cabinet, be allowed to go to the front as has been intimated in despatches from Winnipeg.
>
> If Dr. Montague is really desirous of serving his country he can best do so by remaining right in Winnipeg and helping as a material witness to oust the graft that seems to have such a strangle hold there.
>
> Dr. Montague is nearly 57 years of age, and by no means as active as he once was. Who gave him a commission? Who got him preference over a lot of younger and more eager doctors in this country?
>
> The trick of Dr. Montague's going to the front—and it is nothing more or less than a trick—is another clumsy attempt to put on the lid in Manitoba—so clumsy that any person can see through it.

CONSTIPATION CAN BE CURED.

There Is Nothing To Equal Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills For This Purpose.

Mrs. A. Cumming, Manchester, Ont., writes: "I have been troubled with constipation for over five years, and feel it my duty to let you known that your Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills have cured me. I only used three vials, and I can faithfully say that they have saved me from a large doctor bill."

Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills regulate the flow of bile to act properly on the bowels, and thus keep them regular. Irregular bowels are the main cause of constipation.

The price of Milburn's Laxa-Liver Pills is 25c per vial or 5 vials for $1.00, at all dealers or mailed direct on receipt of price by The T. Milburn Co., Limited, Toronto, Ont.

THE Changeling

"I will deal frankly with you, madam," said he, "and say that if I followed my own inclination I should stay, for Hillsdale holds for me an attraction which no other spot possesses. I refer to your granddaughter, who, in the little time I have known her, has grown very dear to me; so dear that I dare not stay longer where she is, lest I should love her too well and rebel against yielding her to another."

For a moment Madam Conway hesitated; but, thinking the case demanded her speaking, she said: "Possibly, Mr. Carrollton, I can make an explanation which will show some points in a different light from that in which you now see them. Margaret is engaged to Henry Warner, I will admit, but the engagement has become irksome, and yesterday she wrote, asking a release, which he will grant, of course."

Instantly the expression of Mr. Carrollton's face changed, and very intently he listened, while Madam Conway frankly told him the story of Margaret's engagement up to the present time, withholding from him nothing, not even Mag's confession of the interest she felt in him, an interest which had weakened her girlish attachment for Henry Warner.

"You have made me very happy," Mr. Carrollton said to Madam Conway, as, at a late hour he bade her good-night, "happier than I can well express; for, without Margaret, life to me would be dreary indeed."

The next morning, at the breakfast table, Anna Jeffrey, who was in high spirits with the prospect of having Mr. Carrollton for a fellow-traveler, spoke of their intended voyage, saying she could hardly wait for the time to come, and asking if he were not equally impatient to leave so horrid a country as America.

"On the contrary," he replied, "I should be sorry to leave America just yet. I have, therefore, decided to remain a little longer," and his eyes sought the face of Maggie, who, in her joyful surprise, dropped the knife with which she was helping herself to butter, while Anna Jeffrey, quite as much astonished, upset her coffee, exclaiming: "Not going home! What has changed your mind?"

Mr. Carrollton made no direct reply, and she continued her breakfast in no amiable mood; while Maggie, too overjoyed to eat, managed, ere long, to find an excuse for leaving the table. Mr. Carrollton wished to do everything honorably; and so he decided to say nothing to Mag of the cause of this sudden change in his plan until Henry Warner's answer was received, as she would then feel freer to act as she felt. His resolution, however, was more easily made than kept, and during the succeeding weeks, by actions, if not by words, he more than once told Maggie Miller how much she was beloved; and Maggie, trembling with fear lest the cup of happiness just within her grasp should be rudely dashed aside, waited impatiently for the letter which was to set her free. But weeks went by, and Maggie's heart grew sick with hope deferred, for there came to her no message from the distant Cuban shore where, in another chapter, we will for a moment go.

CHAPTER XVII.

Brightly shone the moonlight on the sunny isle of Cuba, dancing lightly on the wave, resting softly on the orange groves, and stealing gently through the casement into the room where a young girl lay, whiter far than the flowers strewn upon her pillow. From the commencement of the voyage Rose had drooped, growing weaker every day, until at last all who looked upon her felt that the home, of which she talked so much, would never again be gladdened by her presence. Very tenderly Henry Warner nursed her, bearing her often in his arms upon the vessel's deck, where she could breathe the fresh morning air as it came rippling o'er the sea. But neither ocean breeze nor yet the fragrant breath of Florida's aromatic bowers, where for a time they stopped, had power to rouse her; and when at last Havana was reached, she laid her weary head upon her pillow, whispering to no one of the love which was wearing her life away. With untold anguish at their hearts, both her aunt and Henry watched her, the latter shrinking ever from the thoughts of losing one who seemed a part of his very life.

"I cannot give you up, my Rose. I cannot live without you," he said, when once she talked to him of death. "You are all the world to me," and laying his head upon her pillow he wept, as men will sometimes weep over their first great sorrow.

"Don't, Henry," she said, laying her tiny hand upon his hair; "Maggie will comfort you when I am gone. She will talk to you of me, standing at my grave, for, Henry, you must not leave me here alone. You must carry me home and bury me in dear old Leominster, where my childhood was passed, and where I learned to love you so much, oh, so much!"

There was a mournful pathos in the tone with which the last words were uttered, but Henry Warner did not understand it, and, covering the little, blue-veined hand with kisses, he promised that her grave should be made at the foot of the garden in their far-off home, where the sunset fell softly, and the moonbeams gently shone. That evening Henry sat alone by Rose, who had fallen into a disturbed slumber. For a time he took no notice of the disconnected words she uttered in her dreams, but when, at last, he heard the sound of his own name, he drew near, and, bending low, listened with mingled emotions of joy, sorrow and surprise to a secret which, waking, she would never have told to him, above all others. She loved him—the fair girl he called his sister—but not as a sister loves, and now, as he stood by her, with the knowledge thrilling every nerve, he remembered many bygone scenes, where, but for his blindness, he would have seen how every pulsation of her heart trobbed alone for him, whose hand was plighted to another, and that other no unworthy rival. Beautiful, very beautiful, was the shadowy form which at that moment, seemed standing at his side, and his heart went out toward her as the one above all others to be his bride.

"Had I known it sooner," he thought, "known it before I met the peerless Mag, I might have taken Rose to my bosom and loved her, it may be, with a deeper love than I feel for Maggie Miller, for Rose is everything to me. She has made and keeps me what I am, and how can I let her die, when I have the power to save her?"

There was a movement upon the pillow. Rose was waking, and as her soft blue eyes unclosed and looked up in his face he wound his arms around her kissing her lips, as never before he had kissed her. She was not his sister now—the veil was torn away—a new feeling had been awakened, and as days and weeks went by there gradually crept in between him and Maggie Miller a new love—even a love for the fair-haired Rose, to whom he was kinder, if possible, than he had been before, though he seldom kissed her lips or caressed her in any way.

"It would be wrong," he said, "a wrong to himself—a wrong to her—and a wrong to Maggie Miller, to whom this troth was plighted," and he did not wish it otherwise, he thought; though insensibly there came over him a wish that Maggie herself might weary of the engagement, and seek to break it. "Not that he loved her the less," he reasoned, "but that he pitied Rose the more."

In this manner time passed on, until at last there came to him Maggie's letter, which had been a long time on the sea.

"I expected it," he thought, as he finished reading it, and though conscious for a moment of a feeling of disappointment, the letter brought him far more pleasure than pain.

Of Arthur Carrollton, no mention had been made, but he readily guessed the truth; and, thinking "it is well," he laid the letter aside and went back to Rose, deciding to say nothing to her then. He would wait until his own feelings were more perfectly defined. So a week went by, and again, as he had often done before, he sat with her alone in the stilly night, watched her as she slept, and thinking how beautiful she was, with her golden hair shading her childish face, her long eyelashes resting on her cheek, and her little hands folded meekly upon her bosom.

"She is too beautiful to die," he murmured, pressing a kiss upon her lips.

This act awoke her, and, turning toward him, she said: "Was I dreaming, Henry, or did you kiss me as you used to do?"

"Not dreaming, Rose," he answered; then, rather hurriedly, he added: "I have a letter from Maggie Miller, and ere I answer it I would read it to you. Can you hear it now?"

"Yes, yes," she whispered, faintly, "read it to me, Henry;" and, turning her face away, she listened while he read that Maggie Miller, grown weary of her troth, asked a release from her engagement.

He finished reading, and then waited in silence to hear what Rose would say. But for a time she did not speak. All hope for herself had long since died away, and now she experienced only sorrow for her Henry's disappointment.

"My poor brother," she said, at last, turning her face toward him and taking his hand in hers, "I am sorry for you to lose us both, Maggie and me. What will you do?"

"Rose," he said, bending low, that his brown locks mingled with the yellow tresses of her hair, "Rose, I do not regret Maggie Miller's decision, neither do I blame her for it. She is a noble, true-hearted girl, and so long as I live I shall esteem her highly; but I, too, have changed—have learned to love another. Will you sanction this new love, Rose? Will you say that it is right?"

The white lids closed nearly over the eyes of blue, but they could not keep back the tears which rolled down her face, as she answered, somewhat sadly: "Who is it, Henry?"

There was another moment of silence, and then he whispered in her ear: "People call her Rose. I once called her sister, but my heart now claims her for something nearer. My Rose," he continued, "shall it be? Will you live for my sake? Will you be my wife?"

The shock was too sudden—too great, and neither on that night, nor yet the succeeding day had Rose the power to answer. But as the dew of heaven is to the parched and dying flower, so were these words of love to her, imparting at once new life and strength, making her, as it were, another creature. The question asked that night so unexpectedly was answered at last; and then, with almost perfect happiness at her heart, she, too, added a few lines to the letter which Henry sent to Maggie Miller, over whose pathway, hitherto so bright, a fearful shadow was falling.

CHAPTER XVIII.

It was a rainy April day—a day which precluded all outdoor exercise, and Hagar Warren, from the window of her lonely cabin, watched in vain for the coming of Maggie Miller. It was now more than a week since she had been there, for both Arthur Carrollton and herself had accompanied the disappointed Anna Jeffrey to New York, going with her on board the vessel which was to take her from a country she so affected to dislike.

"I dare say you'll be Maggie somebody else ere I meet you again," she said to Maggie, at parting, and Mr. Carrollton, on her journey home, found it hard to keep from asking her if for the "somebody else" she would substitute his name and so be "Maggie Carrollton."

This, however, he did not do, but his attentions were so marked, and his manner toward her so affectionate, that ere Hillsdale was reached there was in Maggie's mind no longer a doubt as to the nature of his feelings toward her. Arrived at home, he kept her constantly at his side, while Hagar, who was suffering from a slight attack of rheumatism and could not go up to the stone house, waited and watched, thinking herself almost willing to be teased for the secret, if she could once more hear the sound of Maggie's voice. The secret, however, had been forgotten. In the exciting scenes through which Maggie had passed since first she learned of its existence; and it was now a long, long time since she had mentioned it to Hagar, who each day grew more and more determined never to reveal it.

"My life is almost ended," she thought, "and the secret shall go with me to my grave. Margaret will be happier without it, and it shall not be revealed."

Thus she reasoned on that rainy afternoon, when she sat waiting for Maggie, who, she heard, had returned the day before. Slowly the hours dragged on, and the night shadows fell at last upon the forest trees, creeping into the corners of Hagar's room, resting upon the hearthstone, falling upon the window pane, creeping up the wall and affecting Hagar with a nameless fear of some impending evil. This fear not even the flickering flame of the lamp, which she lighted at last, and placed upon the mantel, was able to dispel, for the shadows grew darker, folding themselves around her heart, until she covered her eyes with her hands, lest some goblin should spring into life before her.

The sound of the gate latch was heard, and footsteps were approaching the door, not the bounding step of Maggie, but a tramping tread, followed by a heavy knock, and the next moment a tall, large man appeared before her, asking shelter for the night. The pack he carried showed him at once to be a peddler, and upon a nearer view, Hagar recognized in him a stranger, who, years before, had craved her hospitality. He had been civil to her then; she did not fear him now, and she consented to his remaining, thinking his presence there might dispel the mysterious terror hanging around her. But few words passed between them that night, for Martin, as he called himself, was tired, and after partaking of the supper she prepared, he retired to rest. The next morning, however, he was more talkative, kindly enlightening her with regard to his business, his family and his place of residence, which last he said was in Meriden, Connecticut.

It was a long time since Hagar had heard that name, and now, turning quickly toward him, she said: "Meriden? That is where my Hester lived, and where her husband died."

"I want to know," returned the Yankee peddler, "What might have been his name?"

"Hamilton—Nathan Hamilton. Did you know him? He died nineteen years ago this coming summer."

"Exactly!" ejaculated the peddler, setting down his pack and himself taking a chair preparatory to a long talk. "Exactly; I knowed him like a book. Old Squire Hampleton, the biggest man in Meriden, and you don't say his last wife, that tall, handsome gal, was your darter?"

"Yes, she was my daughter," answered Hagar, her whole face glowing with the interest she felt in talking for the first time in her life with one who had known her daughter's husband, Maggie's father. "You knew her? You have seen her?" she continued; and Martin answered: "Seen her a hundred times, I'll bet. Anyhow, I sold her the weddin' gown, and now I think on't, she favored you. She was a likely person, and I allus thought that proud sister of his'n, the widder Warner, might have been in better business than takin' them children away as she did, because he married his hired gal. But it's as well for them, I suppose, particularly for the boy, who is one of the fust young men in Wooster, now. Keeps a big store!"

"Warner, Warner!" interrupted old Hagar, the nameless terror of the night before creeping again into her heart. "Whose name did you say was Warner?"

"The hull on 'em, boy, girl and all, is called Warner now—one Rose and t'other Henry," answered the peddler, perfectly delighted with the interest manifested by his auditor, who, grasping at the bedpost, and moving her hand rapidly before her eyes, as if to clear away a mist which had settled there, continued, "I remember now Hester told me of the children; but one, she said, was a stepchild: that was the boy, wasn't it?" and her wild, black eyes had in them a look of unutterable anxiety, wholly incomprehensible to the peddler, who, instead of answering her question, said: "What ails you, woman? Your face is as white as a piece of paper?"

"Thinking of Hester always affects me so," she answered, and stretching her hands beseechingly toward him, she entreated him to say if Henry were not the step-child.

"No, marm, he wasn't," answered the peddler, who like a great many talkative people, pretended to know more than he really did, and who in this particular instance was certainly mistaken. "I can tell you egsactly how that is. Henry was the son of Mr. Hampleton's first marriage, Henry Hampleton. The second wife, the one your darter lived with, was the widder Warner, and had a little gal, Rose, when she married Mr. Hampleton. This widder Warner's husband's brother married Mr. Hampleton's sister, the woman who took the children and had Henry change his name to Warner. The Hampletons and Warners were mighty big feelin' folks, and the old Squire's match mortified 'em dreadfully."

"Where are they now?" gasped Hagar, hoping there might be some mistake.

"There you've got me!" answered Martin. "I haven't seen 'em this dozen year; but the last I heard, Miss Warner and Rose was livin' in Leominster, and Henry was in a big store in Wooster. But what the plague is the matter?" he continued, alarmed at the expression of Hagar's face, as well as at the strangeness of her manner.

Wringing her hands as if she would wrench her fingers from their sockets, she clutched at her long white hair, and rocking to and fro, moaned, "Woe is me, and woe the day when I was born."

From every one save her granddaughter Margaret had kept the knowledge of her changed feelings toward Henry Warner; and looking upon a marriage between the two as an event surely expected, old Hagar was overwhelmed with grief and fear. Falling "Had you cut my throat from ear to at last upon her knees, she cried, ear, old man, you could not have hurt me more. Oh, that I had died years and years ago! But I must live now, live!" she screamed, springing to her feet; "live to prevent the wrong my own wickedness has caused."

Perfectly astonished at what he saw and heard, the peddler attempted to question her, but failing to obtain any satisfactory answers, he finally left, mentally pronouncing her "as crazy as a loon." This opinion was confirmed by the people on whom he next called, for, chancing to speak of Hagar, he was told that nothing which she did or said was considered strange, as she had been called insane for years. This satisfied Martin, who made no further mention of her, and thus the scandal which his story might otherwise have produced was prevented.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson V. August 1, 1915.

The Queen of Sheba visits Solomon.—1. Kings 10: 1-10, 13.

Commentary.—I. The Fame of Solomon (vs. 1, 2). 1. The Queen of Sheba—It is quite certain that Sheba was a country in the southern part of Arabia, bordering on the Red Sea. Its wealth and variety of resources are shown by the particulars mentioned in this narrative. Its distance from Jerusalem was one thousand five hundred miles or more. Some commentators have located Sheba in Ethiopia in Africa, but not on sufficient grounds. Research has shown that this country was ruled by a succession of queens. fame of Solomon—Even in that age of slow communication between widely-removed places, reports spread far and wide. Solomon's ships sailed on the Red Sea, and from this fact the knowledge of his greatness may have reached Sheba. Caravans were making long journeys for commercial purposes and furnished a means for conveying information. concerning the name of the Lord—In relation to the name of the Lord, Solomon's fame was great, but it was great because of what God did for him and his people, and because of what he was enabled to do for God. to prove him—To test him. The queen of Sheba was not merely curious; she desired to learn some of the deep wisdom possessed by Solomon. hard questions—Such as riddles. This was a common custom among the arabs of ancient and modern times, to test the sagacity and wisdom of distinguished persons.—Whedon. 2. came to Jerusalem—Her desire to see and hear for herself was great. If it had not been, she would not have gone that great distance. The journey each was must have required two or three months. great train—A large number of beasts of burden and attendants. camels—The camel was then and still is, the great beast of burden of the Orient. It is used for carrying purposes. The rocking motion of the camel as it walks is not pleasant to one accustomed to that means of transportation. spices—Arabia is noted for its spices. The queen brought the products of her own country. all that was in her heart—She made known to him her purpose in coming, and asked him the questions that were upon her mind. She must have had questions of great importance to ask and matters of deep interest to discuss or she would not have been likely to undertake the long journey.

II. The Queen's wonder (vs. 3-5). 3. All her questions—None of the queen's questions were too difficult for Solomon to answer. The Lord had promised him wisdom and that promise was fulfilled. Not any thing hid from the king.—He knew the correct answers to all her questions. 4. And the house that he had built—In addition to Solomon's wisdom there were material things that made a deep impression upon the queen's mind. The house which is here mentioned is probably the king's palace, for the narrative passes on immediately to matters pertaining to Solomon's domestic affairs. 5. Meat of his table—The amount and variety of food used by his household were great. It required about three hundred and forty bushels of fine flour and seven hundred bushels of meal every day to supply the household. Thirty oxen, a hundred sheep, besides other animals, were used each day (1 Kings 4. 22, 23). Sitting of his servants—Here "servants" signifies the officers and distinguished persons who were privileged to sit at the King's table, and were arranged according to rank and in large numbers at the royal banquets.—Cam. Bib. Attendance of his ministers—This has reference to the arrangement by which each servant had his place about the king's house and stood ready to perform the service required of him. Their apparel—The servants were well clad in uniform. Cupbearers—Servants who had charge of the king's plate and who poured out wine for him. His ascent unto the house of the Lord—The temple stood on Mount Zion across the Tyropoeon valley. This valley was anciently a deep ravine, perhaps eighty to one hundred feet in depth. Med in excavations have uncovered the ruins of an ancient viaduct leading across the ravine. It is quite probable that this is the ascent here mentioned. The valley is now mostly filled up, so that there is a comparatively slight depression. No more spirit in her—The wisdom and riches of Solomon so far surpassed her expectations that she was astonished beyond measure. Those words indicate that she fainted, but we suppose that she was greatly amazed.

III. Her acknowledgement (vs. 6-9). 6. It was a true report—This statement implies that she had had doubts about Solomon's reported wisdom and wealth, but freely acknowledges that the report was true. Of thy acts—This has reference to the king's material greatness, mentioned in verses 4 and 5 rather than to his wisdom which is particularly stated. She herself had great wealth and a rich kingdom, as is evident from the present she brought to Solomon, but she saw that his condition was more prosperous than hers. 7. I believed not.—The reports went far beyond what she had ever seen and it was difficult for her to believe them. Mine eyes had seen—Then she could not help believing. The half was not told me—In the reports there had been an attempt to express the facts, but the language had not been strong enough or the queen's comprehension had not been large enough, hence the reality far exceeded her idea of Solomon's wisdom and prosperity. The unconverted man can not comprehend the blessedness of being saved. After conversion more than one has said that salvation was far better than he had imagined, although he had been told about it over and over again.

8. Happy—Those who were in the king's presence as relatives, officers, or even as servants, were considered favored. The queen of Sheba looked upon it as a great privilege and honor to be in Solomon's household. 9. Blessed be the Lord thy God—This shows that the queen understood that Solomon recognized all his wisdom and wealth as the gift of God. He was faithful to his God, and it is possible, as Jewish writers claim, that she was converted to the true God through Solomon's influence.—Peloubet. Her words show that she acknowledged God as the giver of wisdom and prosperity to Solomon. Because the Lord loved Israel for ever. The queen believed that God's love for Israel was strong, therefore he placed such a capable man as Solomon upon the throne. She spoke as a woman of intelligence and thoughtfulness, and manifested a reverent disposition.

IV. Gifts exchanged (vs. 10, 13). 10. An hundred and twenty talents of gold—The value of a talent of gold is about thirty thousand dollars, hence the present of gold was upward of three and a half million dollars. Her presents were in keeping with her position. Such a bestowment of gifts was in accordance with Oriental custom. No more such abundance of spices—This indicates to some extent the productiveness of the queen's country in spices. 13. All her desire—Solomon not only gave his illustrious guest all the insight and information she wanted; but, according to the Oriental fashion, gave her ample remuneration for the presents she had brought.—J., F. and B.

Questions.—What great works had Solomon done during his reign? Who came to see his greatness? How could his fame reach remote places? What did the queen of Sheba bring to Solomon? How was she impressed with his wisdom and wealth? What respect had she for the true God? How did she regard the Israelitish nation? What did Solomon give her? Why was this interchange of gifts? What New Testament references are there to this event?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Solomon's queenly visitor.

I. A model seeker after truth.

II. Recognized God as supreme.

I. A model seeker after truth. The Queen of Sheba went to Jerusalem with one dominant, overpowering intention. She was a thoughtful woman, perplexed in the problems of her day, needing the counsel of one wiser than herself. She was true to the needs of her own heart, sincere and genuine. She would not allow the affairs of an empire to drown the cry of her heart. She set every other consideration aside to give attention to her inner life. She was willing to expend labor and money, to endure fatigue, to exercise long patience in order to satisfy the questions uppermost in her mind, questions relating to deep and important problems in religious life. Though a queen, great and rich, cultured and influential, she was obviously troubled at heart about the solemn mystery of existence, and wished to have all doubts solved, all questions answered, all anxieties allayed by one who seemed to be specially raised up as the embodiment and teacher of wisdom. In her heart was a void which nothing but the knowledge of God could fill. It was of him she would hear and learn, and whom she longed to worship and obey. Her soul was stirred with profoundest questions of life and death and immortality. Her mode of proving Solomon's wisdom was by endeavoring to learn from him. She did not attempt to find fault with or to deprecate any of the endowments of the king. She was more earnest than curious. It was a meeting most picturesque and full of interest, a heathen queen in the presence of Jehovah's anointed king, natural piety seeking revelation's light. The queen of Sheba proved her sincerity by making personal inquiry. Solomon's wisdom lay in the gift of an understanding heart to judge and discern between good and evil. His wisdom was his distinctive characteristic. It was a divine gift which was given in response to his own prayer that he might be made a blessing to others. The queen had an ear to hear. She was prompt to discern and discriminate. She gathered from Solomon a great store of knowledge and of truth.

II. Recognized God as supreme. When the queen of Sheba saw and heard at Jerusalem altogether surpassed her anticipation. She doubtless learned for the first time the fundamental truths of religion. Solomon resolved her perplexity and with perfect skill discovered her longings and unrest and gave satisfactory answers to all her questions. Her labor, fatigue and patience were fully rewarded. The great end of Israel's existence as a nation was to bear witness to the name and character of Jehovah. By the wisdom and energy, combined with the piety of Solomon, this was being accomplished. The works of the Lord were known even in remote lands, so much as to engage the attention of this earnest queen. She went back to her country mentally and spiritually enriched beyond her highest expectations. The reality transcended all reports. The things which she saw did much to enlarge her mind and gave her higher thoughts of God. It is evident that she rejoiced in the fact that she had come to see a man on whom the spirit of God rested. The prosperity and blessedness of others were a matter of thanksgiving to her. She possessed an open mind with generous apprehensions of faith. She acknowledged and praised Jehovah as the author of Solomon's advancement. She regarded it as God's special favor to Solomon that he was set on the throne of Israel to rule his people. She regarded it as a token of God's great love to Israel that so wise and pious a prince was set over them. Her grateful homage was expressed not only in praise but in generous gifts from her native land to the king of Israel. Solomon's broad outlook stood out in striking contrast to the narrowness of some of his contemporaries and successors. The time of this event marked the climax of Israel's strength and prosperity. It is the only event in the reign of Solomon to which reference is made in the New Testament. Jesus made it an important channel of divine instruction. He used it as a reproof to indifference concerning his Messiahship. Upon his authority the narrative is used as an illustration of spiritual truth, as a call to diligent search after divine truth.

Sulphuric Acid and Civilization.

Liebig said that we might gauge the civilization of a country by the quantity of sulphuric acid it consumed. The total output of this acid is now about 5,000,000 tons, according to the fourth edition of Professor G. Lunge's treatise on its manufacture. At least 1,000,000 tons a year have been made in Germany, and that country has been importing about 100,000 tons besides.

Sulphuric acid is made principally from iron pyrites, but also from zinc blende. It is essential in the manufacture of high explosives, but there is scarcely a process of manufacture into which it does not enter. It is said that there is no branch of chemical technology that has been more thoroughly developed than that of the manufacture of sulphuric acid, but so keen is the competition that improvement [illegible]
